Premising that this Federal land bank system, with all of its elaborate provisions, might be a failure, the committee has recommended the trial of another system which is called a joint-stock land bank. In this last system it is getting down to a more practical proposition. There are such banks operated as private concerns in the country, banks or associations that deal only in farm mortgages. Some of these, as I am informed, guarantee the farmers' paper. They loan to the farmer for 6 and 7 per cent interest and they borrow money for from 4 to 5 per cent, use it in the purchase of that farm loan, and their profit is from 1 to 2 per cent.

Now, that is in substance the proposition of my amendment to the rural credits bill, except it reduces interest to the farmer to 4½ per cent. Instead of the Government buying all of the stock, as it naturally will in these Federal land banks—instead of its paying a portion of these heavy expenses—instead of its furnishing money to be used without compensation—instead of its losing its capital in an investment—instead of all these overhead expenses my amendment provides that the Treasurer of the United States shall take the first-mortgage loans on farms, operated by farmers, and upon which farmers are living, bearing 4½ per cent, and that the Government shall secure from lenders the money to purchase these mortgages, which shall never be greater in amount than half the value of the lands, for 4 per cent, holding the mortgages as security and making a profit of one-half of 1 per cent, which will, in my opinion, pay more than its expenses if it does its business through the Federal and State banks now in existence.

It is barely possible, Mr. President, that some of these loan associations already organized, doing business in the manner I have suggested, may think there is some advantage in being organized under Federal laws or induced to incorporate under the Federal act and get the Government to go into the proposition as a partner, furnishing the greater amount of the capital without interest. This, I admit, may possibly bring into existence the joint-stock banks. But even those will be so controlled by the Government, will be so loaded down with conditions, will be so hampered by Government agents, and will have such salaries of Government employees to be met that the business, in my judgment, could not be made a success.

These joint-stock banks may be formed by any number of persons, not less than 10, and the shareholders shall be held individually responsible, equally and rateably, for all contracts, debts, and engagements of such bank to the extent of the amount of the stock owned by them in addition to the amount paid in and represented by their shares. In other words, following the rules with reference to national banks, if there is a failure, the stockholder will not only lose the money he put in but may be assessed just that much more to meet the debts of the institution.

Now, no person would take that responsibility unless the profits to be obtained would be sufficient to justify the liability. And those profits could only be met by the interest that would be paid by the farmer making the loan, and that means that he could not get cheap money.

The promoters of this legislation seem to forget that some one mush meet the vast expenses incident to the operation of these banks. They seem to forget that the only real profit that comes to these banks must come from the interest on mortgage loans. The farmer must pay it. The farmer wants a low rate of interest. And, Mr. President, a low rate of interest will not meet the demands of this complex, political, Government ridden institution.

Under the joint-stock proposition the Government of the United States can not purchase or subscribe for any of the capital stock. The joint-stock bank may be organized in some States for $250,000 and in others at $500,000, according to population.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have been detained from the Senate, and so have not been privileged to hear the Senator's remarks up to this point; but I note the Senator says that the farmer wants a low rate of interest. About what rate of interest would that be, may I ask the Senator?

Mr. HOLLIS. I am deeply interested in the discussion, and I wish my colleague would speak so that I can hear him.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will endeavor to do so. The Senator from North Dakota has suggested that the farmer wanted a low rate of interest. I inquired of the Senator about what rate of interest the farmer would consider a low rate.

Mr. McCUMBER. I thought, Mr. President, that the rate of 4½ per cent, as provided for in the bill which I introduced, to be charged to the farmer was certainly as low as he could possibly expect.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I will make a suggestion as to the method that is adopted in New Hampshire. Our banks are loaning money freely to the farmers at 5 per cent on mortgages which are free from taxation. That seems with us to be a very satisfactory rate; and, so far as I know, there is no complaint whatever made as to the rate.

Mr. McCUMBER. And, in addition, I think the Senator might also state that in New Hampshire the farmer has the privilege of paying off his mortgage probably at any interest-bearing date.

Mr. GALLINGER. He has.

Mr. McCUMBER. He has the privilege of doing so at least in five years.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is true.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, may I ask a question here?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I want to ask the Senator from New Hampshire how long such mortgages run as a rule?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not know as to that, but I think they are very liberal in that regard. I apprehend that there may be no specified date, but as to that possibly my colleague knows better than I do.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I will state that practically all mortgage loans in New Hampshire made by savings banks are either on demand or for six months, but where the security is kept good they are allowed to run on indefinitely. It is well recognized in New Hampshire that when a farmer puts a mortgage on his farm, unless he is fortunate enough to sell a timber lot, it stays there until he dies, and this bill is intended to have amortized loans, so that the farmer will be encouraged to pay off his mortgage instead of allowing it to run indefinitely.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is about as I have understood it. Mortgages, however, are rarely foreclosed in our State.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota permit me to ask him whether or not this rate of interest, 5 per cent, is confined to the farmers?

Mr. GALLINGER. Not at all.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Can anybody borrow money at 5 per cent?

Mr. GALLINGER. Anybody can, but the banks are making very liberal loans to farmers at the present time, more liberal than they did in former years.

Mr. McCUMBER. Because of his security?

Mr. GALLINGER. Because of his security.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But anybody with good security can borrow money in New Hampshire at 5 per cent?

Mr. GALLINGER. He can get it at 5 per cent.

Mr. McCUMBER. If we could get money on our farms all over the United States at the rate of 5 per cent, as suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire, I do not think anyone would have ever introduced a bill of this character. I do not think we could complain of the 5 per cent rate, and I am a little inclined to think that the banking system provided in this bill could not make enough profit to pay its expenses and loan money at 5 per cent. Therefore, I do not think any such banks will be established in the State of New Hampshire.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I wish to ask one further question. Does the Senator from New Hampshire know whether the farmer is charged commissions for making those loans?

Mr. GALLINGER. The farmer is not charged any commission whatever. The loans are made directly by the banks.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Who pays the expense of the abstract of title?

Mr. GALLINGER. We rarely ever require abstracts of title in New Hampshire. We are an old State; we were finished a good while ago, and we do not have to go through with a good deal of the process that in some other States is necessary. I think there is no charge whatever beyond the 5 per cent interest.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota yield to me for a moment?

Mr. McCUMBER Certainly.

Mr. HOLLIS. I do not want any misunderstanding in regard to this matter. I have been trustee of one of our largest savings banks for a good many years. Every applicant for a loan from a savings bank has to pay for looking up the title; an attorney has to search the title and certify that it is good. The mortgagor has also to pay for drawing the papers and for recording the deed; but in New Hampshire those charges are very light; they would appear so to a westerner, at any rate.

Mr. GALLINGER. They are a mere trifle.

Mr. HOLLIS. Investigation shows that there are more or less commissions that creep in in one way and another, so that the average rate on farm loans in New Hampshire, including the commissions and the charges, is 5.3 per cent.

Mr. McCUMBER. Now, to proceed. Having provided these two systems of banks, we must in some way connect them up with the borrowers. This is done by providing farm-loan associations, both limited and unlimited—we have a double system there again—and providing that such associations shall have representation on boards of directors of the banks in proportion to the amount of unpaid principal on loans made to their members by the land banks. There are a vast number of complex provisions relating to this, the principal one of which is the bigger the debt the greater the voting power.

Section 7, relating to these national farm-loan associations, provides that the directors and all officers, except the secretary-treasurer, shall serve without compensation unless payment of salaries is approved by the Federal farm-loan board. I do not know how it is in some other States, but I know the farmers of my State can not and will not give their time without compensation. The position of officer of that association will be a thankless job, and no one will court it.

As I have stated before, this bill seems to be based upon an assumption that there is philanthropy in business. That is not the American idea, so far as I have been able to ascertain it. I know of no one in this country who is spending his time and talents solely for the benefit of some one else.

Then it is provided that the reasonable expenses of the secretary-treasurer of the loan committee, and other officers of these farm-loan associations and salary of the secretary-treasurer shall be paid from the general funds of the associations; and when no such funds are available the board of directors may levy an assessment upon members and prospective members of the association in proportion to the amount of loans granted or applied for by them, which may be repaid as soon as funds are available; or it may secure an advance from the Federal land bank of the district, to be repaid with interest at 6 per cent per annum, from dividends belonging to said association.

I want anyone who knows anything about northern agriculture, at least, to ask himself whether if he were living upon one of those farms he would be willing to obligate himself for such expenses? Would he subject himself to such assessments? And if it were possible to borrow this money from a Federal land bank—and I do not know where the Federal land bank would get it, unless it had something to sell, for even the Government deposits can not be used to purchase a mortgage—the fact that the interest on the obligation of the association is 6 per cent would mean that the farmer would have to pay at least 8 or 10 per cent in order to meet this interest and added overhead expenses.

I am very positive, Mr. President, that no farmer in a normal state of mind would tie himself up to such a proposition.

It is then provided in the same section that 10 or more natural persons, owners or to become owners of farm lands, qualified as security for a mortgage loan, may unite to form a national farm-loan association, and that loans of not more than ten thousand or less than two hundred may be made to one person. This opens up, if the bill could be operated at all, an opportunity for speculators. The number of farmers who would ever want to borrow $10,000 are quite scarce. It is not even necessary that the person making the application shall live upon the land and farm it at all. He may rent it or hire some one else to operate it. He may be a speculator pure and simple. He may be simply an owner of land or he may desire to purchase land. If he could get the Government to carry the loan in a State which is rapidly developing, he might well afford to pay the interest, buy a large tract of land, and wait for the rise in value.

Then there is another provision, very peculiar, which, in my opinion, would stop the prospective North Dakota borrower at the very threshhold of the bank. It is this:

> Any person desiring to borrow must purchase stock at par equal to 5 per cent of the face of the loan, which shall be paid off and retired upon full payment of the loan.

In other words, if a farmer wants to borrow $2,000 he must first spend a hundred dollars to entitle him to that privilege. Of course, that hundred dollars, on which he will have to pay interest to some one, may be a complete loss. The provision is that it will be returned to him when the loan is paid. But what guaranty has he that it will not be used up in the expense account of the system? He is not only not protected, but he is liable to be assessed for expenses. And even if it were repaid, he has lost the interest which he has paid on this money, and this, added to the interest which he pays upon the principal loan, may make his interest charges more than they now are.

Turning to the restrictions on loans, we find that they, of course, must be duly recorded first mortgages. Then there must be an agreement under the provisions of section 12 for the payment of a fixed number of semiannual installments, sufficient to provide for an agreed rate of interest during the term and the payment of principal on what is known as the amortization plan. In other words, the farmer borrowing must pay his interest and a portion of the principal every six months. In the northern cereal-raising States we have but one crop a year. The farmer must pay everything out of that crop. That crop is not generally harvested before November. Now, he must either retain enough money without interest to pay the installment due the next June or else he must borrow the money in the bank the next June to pay the interest and carry him over until he harvests his next crop. This will necessitate borrowing at the local bank. I think the average farmer will have enough sagacity to understand that if he pays interest semiannually he pays more than the annual rate of interest. There is not a loan made in the Northwest now that provides for semiannual interest. Practically all mortgages are so drawn that the interest payments are due from November to January.

Under the provisions of this bill every mortgage runs for at least 5 years and not more than 36 years. Can any of you Senators comprehend the state of mind of a northern farmer who would want to tie up his land in a mortgage for 36 years, or 30 years? Why, we can not even find any who are willing to make a 10-year loan, and the truth is that in most instances they are insisting upon the right, even in a 5-year loan, of paying the principal on any interest-paying date. This amortization plan, applicable in Europe, where land values are excessively high, where the purchaser of land is not supposed to be able to pay off the mortgage in less than from two to three generations, has no applicability to States where land passes from hand to hand, from man to man, almost as freely as horses and cattle. Our farmers are at least sufficiently optimistic to believe that within from 5 to 10 years they will be able to lift any mortgage. And if they are sensible they would prefer to pay a higher rate of interest and have the privilege of paying off any amount at any time they see fit than to carry principal and interest from 25 to 30 years. This right to pay off principal in whole or in part after five years is given in the bill. I mention the longer term simply to show that it will not be taken advantage of, at least in the northern sections.

Again, it is provided that the rate of interest charged for such loans shall not exceed the legal rate of interest fixed by law for national banks. The rate fixed for national banks is the rate limit fixed by the State. They can not collect usurious interest. In my State the limit would be 10 per cent. In some parts of the State farmers are able now to borrow money at 6 per cent, and it ranges all the way from that to 10 per cent in the new sections.

I understood, however, from the remark of the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] yesterday, in criticizing this same bill, that the rate could not exceed 5 per cent. I do not so read it, unless the provision has been amended since I read it.

Again, the farmer is limited in the purposes for which he wishes to borrow the money. He may borrow it to buy a home or a farm, or for equipment of that farm, for buildings and improvements, or to pay a debt that is already in existence.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. HOLLIS. I do not desire to have the Senator labor under a misapprehension. The bill provides that the farm-loan bonds shall not carry a rate higher than 5 per cent, and that the banks shall not loan at a rate to exceed 1 per cent more than the rate that the bonds carry. Therefore it will not be possible, under the committee bill, to loan to farmers at a rate exceeding 6 per cent.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am afraid, Mr. President, from my knowledge of the business in the Northwest at least, that the expenses of conducting this system would be such that it would be impossible to loan to the farmers even for 6 per cent.

Mr. HOLLIS. But the bill especially limits it. If they can not loan at 6 per cent or less, they can not loan at all, under this bill; so the farmer of North Dakota will not be injured.

Mr. McCUMBER. It could not be operated in a State at all if the expenses would be more than that.

The farmer could not borrow this money, for instance, to send his son to college. He could not borrow it to send his wife to a hospital, although his land might be clear. He could not borrow money to send a member of his family to be operated on for appendicitis by a specialist. He would have to go to the bank in such case and pay the rate of interest charged by the bank. If the loan is a safe one, and it ought not to be made unless it is safe, then it ought not to be any business of the Government what purpose the money is borrowed for.

The statement of Mr. Youmans in opposition to this rural credits bill was criticized. Here is one of the statements:

Even the most ardent champion of the legislation can not but admit that its provisions are clumsy, cumbersome, and provide an enormous amount of useless machinery to do a very simple thing.

Now, I want any Senator to read over this bill of 78 pages and then say whether this objection is well founded. The only thing to be accomplished is that the farmer be able to secure money on a mortgage bearing a low rate of interest. The means of effectuating that simple proposition, according to the views of the proponents of this bill, necessitates one of the most cumbersome, complex systems that could be conceived of, a system far more cumbersome than the entire banking system of the United States, a system that not only duplicates in number the regional banks, but provides for two distinct systems of local banks, and for the necessity of another system of farm organizations, a system which requires farm organizations and the individual farmers who wish to borrow to subscribe for stock and to become affiliated with this enormous machine, the duty and functions of which are set out with such elaborateness and detail and are so inconsistent with each other in many instances that nothing short of the courts can finally construe their meaning.

Another point made by Mr. Youmans is:

By the provisions of section 31 it is made the duty of the farm loan commissioner to make examination of the laws of every State in the United States and to inform the farm loan board as rapidly as may be whether in his judgment the laws of each State, relating to the conveying and recording of land titles and the foreclosure of mortgages or other instruments securing loans, as well as providing homestead and other exemptions and granting the power to waive such exemptions as respects first mortgages, are such as to assure to the holder thereof adequate safeguards against loss in the event of default on loans secured by such mortgages.

Pending the making of such examination in the case of any State the Federal farm loan board may declare first mortgages on farm lands situated within such State ineligible as the basis for an issue of the farm-loan bonds.

As suggested by Mr. Youmans, the first duty of the farm-loan commissioner would be to make an examination of the laws of the State. And while he is making that examination every mortgage therefrom must necessarily be ineligible. In other words, they could not be received until he makes favorable report. Why is such provision necessary? Is it conceivable that any State in the Union has not provided a system of recording securities on land and of foreclosing the same and obtaining title? Every one of these States has such provisions. Neither the Federal board nor any other Federal authority could change them or modify them in any respect. It opens up a field for excuse and delay. That is the only objection that probably can be urged to that provision, that it is absolutely useless.

Again, as I have already stated, this system is a duplication of the regional-bank system in some respects, and it might be well to know the expense of operating the Federal banking system. Mr. Youmans says:

It is plain from an examination of the bill that it is designed upon the general model of the Federal reserve act. It provides for a Federal farm-loan board of five members, four of whose salaries alone will aggregate $40,000 a year.

There are in continental United States about 8,000 national banks, members of the Federal Reserve System.

The expenses of the Federal Reserve Board alone are about $216,000 a year. The salaries of its employees amount to $108,650 per year, and the salaries of the examiners who examine the banks in the Federal Reserve System amount to $396,000 per year.

The expenses of the Federal reserve banks, of which there are 12, were last year $1,490,729. The estimated expenses of these same banks for next year are $1,611,000. These expenses include such items of salaries as governor, ranging from $30,000 a year to $7,500 a year; members of the staff, from $12,000 a year, with various head men at four, five, six, eight, and ten thousand a year.

In fact, the Federal Reserve Board admits in its report, December 31, 1915, Document No. 442, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, that several of these banks are overorganized in their high-salaried lists.

But these expenses, great as they are, were founded on the mobilization and concentrated organization of the business of 8,000 national banks already established and existing.

There are about 20,000 State and private banks, including 1,660 loan and trust companies, scattered throughout the country.

Still, in the face of all these facts and conditions it is not proposed by the provisions of this bill to use any part of existing financial agencies, but to create an additional burdensome system for the farmers to support.

Mr. Youmans further states:

The bill seems to assume that farm-loan associations composed of "borrowers" will be promptly organized either on the limited or unlimited plan, and that by this means both a surplus and "capital" will be supplied.

Such associations can have neither income nor capital except it be supplied by the farmers. An association composed of borrowers alone can rarely supply either.

These farm-loan associations may assess the farmers for "interest, dues, and other sums," and fix the interest rate at the limit of the interest charged by national banks. This in effect would make the interest charges to the farmers higher than those afforded by established institutions.

For information as to interest rates, commissions, and other data see tables in appendix, which were submitted by Secretary Houston before the joint committee November 13, 1915.

It is thus seen that this feature of the bill, not taking into account inertia or local opposition, is practically impossible of successful working out.

These farm-loan associations are a poor attempt to follow the plan of building and loan associations, so many of which failed a few years ago on account of expenses and inability to provide capital from borrowers alone.

And finally in his statement he says:

"Instead of being a piece of genuine rural-credit legislation, the system provided is only a shadowy substance floating in a sea of finance with neither chart, compass, nor sailing orders. It is simply a head, the Federal farm loan board resting upon nothing. This head must develop its own body, temporarily using the funds of the Federal Government in the meanwhile, while it attempts to find out through the farm loan commissioner whether there are any safe landing places under the land laws of the several States. The administrative features are overweighted with officers and salaries.

"It provides that there can be no farm loans under this system until there are borrowing-farmers' loan associations, and there can be no borrowing-farmers' loan associations until there is a group of borrowing farmers who are willing to buy stock in such associations and pay the undetermined fees, costs, and expenses which may be incurred.

"These farm-loan associations may not act directly as a means of collecting the savings and available investment funds of the community and as a medium between the investor and borrower, but must, by the terms of the act, be composed of borrowers alone.

"In general, hardly a farmer in the United States could avail himself of the elaborate apparatus attempted to be created by this bill.

"The bill could be nothing else than a failure and its passage merely block the way to a straightforward rural-credit system or systems.

"The opponents of real practical legislation would point to the existence of this law and its unused provisions and solemnly assure the country that it was the result of many commissions, probably half a million dollars of expenditure, and that it was costing, even though unworked and unworkable, perhaps $500,000 a year, and yet was not being used by the farmers of the country, without stopping to explain that its provisions make such use impossible of successful accomplishment.

"These are but a few of the serious and insurmountable objections to the bill as drawn.

"An examination of the bill discloses numerous limitations and restructions upon the operation of the proposed system.

"The dangerous character of the bill is nowhere better illustrated than in the specification of the extensive and, in many cases, senseless powers of the Federal farm loan board, here briefly set out:

Mr. President, I have offered an amendment to this bill, an amendment simple and inexpensive, one that will not cost the Government a penny and will reduce interest on farm loans to 4½ per cent. If I had a million dollars' worth of first-mortgage loans maturing right along from the present time through a period of 20 years, secured on lands which can not be lost, which are as permanent as the earth itself, of the value of at least $2,000,000, I could very well afford to issue my personal bond for a million dollars or a series of bonds of from $100 to $500 each, due in 20 years, with privilege of payment within 10 years, bearing 4 per cent interest, retaining the half per cent interest for my expenses and profits. There could be no possibility of a loss on my part with such a margin. Nothing but the worst character of negligence could bring about any loss.

Now, what I could do, had I the money, can be done by the Government through the use of its instrumentalities in any amount.

The Government has 8,000 national banks. Every national bank is to-day to a certain extent a Government agency. The Government could make every State and private bank, numbering about 20,000, its agency. The Government would then have an agent bank in every little town and village throughout the United States. Every bank has its own officers. Those officers know the men and they know the character of the lands in their respective vicinities. In addition to this there are a large number of bank examiners. These bank examiners in order to know the paper, its character and value, held by any bank, must necessarily know the character of the country which must pay that paper. Now, instead of the creation of another great system of banks, suppose the Government should utilize the banks now operated in the United States and all of their officers and all of these agents. Beginning at the bottom of the procedure: A farmer who would need to borrow a thousand dollars would go to the nearest bank just as he does to-day.

He would make a written application for a thousand-dollar loan, answer about 40 questions which would elicit not only the character and value of his land but its certainty of paying interest and principal of the loan—such a number of acres under cultivation, his family, the number of boys who could do work, and many other questions that would all point toward his ability to make good his payments.

This application would bear the appraisement of two of his neighbors, sworn to. This would be presented to the cashier or president of the bank. He knows the man, he knows the land, and he is also required to pass his judgment on the value and character and safety of this loan. The farmer then draws up his mortgage and accompanies it with an abstract showing the title and showing that it is clear. The banker examines this, passes judgment on it, and receives a small fee for his services. He is the agent of the Government, and is held responsible by the Government for good faith. He sends this mortgage, abstract, and application, with his approval, to the bureau of farm credits in Washington. The papers are examined; they are found to be correct, and the Government advances the money for that loan. At the same time there are a thousand other loans coming in from other sections, and he has enough loans maturing at different times, or will mature as new ones are made each year; and the Government then issues its bond in amounts of from one hundred to five hundred dollars in an amount equal to the mortgages. The mortgages bear 4½ per cent and the bonds 4 per cent. The bonds will run for 20 years. There will be such a demand immediately for these bonds that even premiums will be offered. The money received would pay for the mortgages. The Government would be out nothing. It would simply guarantee, in effect, the mortgages. It would occupy the position of a factor who guarantees the payment of the mortgages. And so this could be continued just as long as there would be purchasers for the bonds. It might amount to even billions, but it would not be the Government money which would be invested. There would be no army of employees to be paid. The system would not be a political system any more than the national banks are now political organizations. There would be no conflict with the local banks. Every farmer doing business with that bank would become the bank's customer. The bank would be paid for its services. It could well afford to act as the agent of the Government and for the convenience of the farmer in the collection of the coupons. If the farmer desired to be carried over for any reason, the bank, knowing the security, would advance him the money to carry him over. If there was a failure of crops one year, the local bank would be glad to assist in carrying the burden of the interest for another year. If the farmer should not have his crop harvested at the time the interest becomes due, the bank would accommodate him. The bank might lose a very little in the interest it is now receiving from farm loans, but it would more than make it up. The smaller the amount the farmer has to send out of the country to pay his interest the greater amount he will have to spend in his own community. This amount saved will be invested and that investment will require business with the bank again.

If you wish to know how the farmer can proceed to make a loan through the system proposed by the committee, all you have to do is to read these 78 pages forward and then backward, and then begin to pick out the sections that would seem to indicate his course of procedure. You will find that before the farmer can make a loan he must wait until at least nine other of his neighbors wish to do the same thing and at the same time. Then he must wait until the spirit of organization begins to move. This is generally a slow-moving process in agricultural communities. But when the fever has progressed to a particular stage and farmers begin to talk over the benefits to be derived by organizing a borrowing society they may possibly take hold of the project. And they may within a year or so crystallize these 10 or 20 or 100 borrowers into an association. That is the first step.

The next step will be to get some kindly disposed gentleman to start a $500,000 bank somewhere in their State or some other State, possibly four or five hundred miles distant from this organization. Of course, they will have to assure this man that he will not be expected to put any real money into the project, just simply start the project going, and the Government will then be compelled, under the provisions of the law, to subscribe for the stock.

After that is done and after all of the vast machinery is set into place, after all the officers have been appointed and their salaries fixed, the next thing will be a request to the farmer who wants to borrow money for a deposit of 5 per cent of the amount of money he wishes to borrow. He must become a lender before he becomes a borrower. He probably has not thought of that before. But with patience he goes to a bank and informs the cashier that he wishes to borrow money from the bank to deposit with another association so that he may borrow from it. The banker may or may not lend the money to assist in losing his customer. The chances are, I think, that the bank would dispose of the question before the farmer ever got away. But if the banker does loan it, he may be satisfied with a straight note or chattel security, or he may demand a mortgage on the farm to secure the money advanced. Having straightened this matter out and deposited the money, then the real business of securing a loan has just begun. The first step has been taken. Now come along the experts, the appraisers, the abstractors, the examiners, the special legal advisers, assistants, and special agents who start him along the pathway of dubious and uncertain complexity until he arrives at the doorway of the real land-bank which may be, as I have suggested, in his own State or in some other State hundreds of miles distant.

I should be pleased to follow him in all of the devious ways he must travel before he secures the money on his proffered mortgage. But, Mr. President, the other business of this session will not permit me to take the time to properly explain each step which must be taken by him before he finally reaches the inner temple, only to find that the capital stock has been used to build an elegant bank building and pay expenses, and the few dollars which were left have already been expended, and the deposits made by the Government under the provisions of the bill can not be invested in mortgage loans. If he is early on the ground, one of the very first, he may find some money in the bank.

But now the question of what interest his loan shall bear must be decided upon. Just how it is to be decided upon before the whole system is in working order and its expenses ascertainable I am unable to say. I assume that the interest must be fixed upon a self-sustaining basis; that while it can not be higher than the State laws would allow, which would be 10 per cent in my State, it must be sufficient to take care of all the expenses. And if it is run upon a self-sustaining basis, even without profit, I believe that the interest would be very much higher than the farmers now generally pay upon first mortgages on real estate.

Mr. President, we have spent enormous sums of money in investigating the rural-credits system of Europe. I think that investment is worse than thrown away, because it has influenced the proponents of rural-credits legislation. It has impressed Old World systems, not at all applicable to conditions in the United States, upon this proposed legislation. I am certain that it would have been much better if we had initiated in this country a system adapted to American conditions and, with our knowledge of those conditions perfected, our legislation without reference to foreign customs. This whole amortization plan is European, not American.

The extremely high price of land in Europe, with its dense population, is such that no purchaser, if he had not already accumulated the means from other sources, could buy that land in a lifetime and pay for it from its earnings. It would be several generations before it would be paid for. The original purchaser would simply transmit to his heirs such equity as he might have, with the purchase price possibly reduced a little. No such condition exists in this country. The American farmer is always optimistic. He expects always to pay for the land with a few crops. He can buy his land on the crop-payment plan in the North. If he has a big crop, he can pay off considerable in a single year. If he has a failure, the matter runs over until the next year. He has not the same sentiment, the same regard, for landed estates that the foreigner has in his country. He will sell his farm as freely as he would sell his stock if he thinks it profitable to do so. He differs from the European farmer in many respects. He is either by nature or custom entirely independent of all his neighbors. He does not live in communities as in Europe. He goes about his own business and has no inclination to attend to the business of others. He is averse to any kind of liability other than his own. He does not like to sign the notes of his neighbors. He does not want to become responsible for the debt of the farmers adjoining him, much less for the debts of farmers in other counties or States. He is opposed to long-term mortgages. Being hopeful and energetic, he wants to pay off his debt whenever he can and in whatever installments he and his creditor may agree upon.

But there is another and greater difference. The American farmer does not want any red-tape business connected with his proceedings. When he wants money he wants it right away. When he wants to pay it, he wants to be at liberty to do so without long delay and secure his release. He regards his time as worth something and is impatient at delays. He would rather pay a higher rate of interest than to be put to too much trouble in securing his loan.

In the amendment which I propose to the farm-credits bill I have answered the demand for simplicity and cheap money. I can see no reason on earth why it is necessary to provide for another distinct or two more distinct banking systems. I do not know why on earth it is necessary to add an enormous expense for the building of new bank structures and for an army of officials. We have our national banks; we have our State banks. They are already constructed, officered, and doing business. They are convenient to every farm in the country. Why not utilize that system and that agency and avoid all this great expense?

My substitute requires no new, complex, and untried system. It is based on the theory that there is any quantity of money in this country ready and eager for investment at 4 per cent on long-time securities free from taxation and of unquestioned safety; that a Government debenture bearing 4 per cent interest will find its purchaser as rapidly as it is offered; that if the Government is proffered a million dollars of farm mortgages bearing 4½ per cent interest, secured on land worth fully $2,000,000, and which farm mortgages mature and others take their places during all of that period of 20 years, the Government can with absolute safety issue its debentures in multiples of $100 for the face of these mortgages, holding the securities, applying the interest received from the mortgages upon the interest due upon the debentures; and that the difference of a half of 1 per cent between the interest on the mortgage and the interest on the debenture will fully compensate the Government for its trouble. The Government, in fact, will not be furnishing the money. In practice the Government will occupy the position of a factor who guarantees the interest on the mortgage which he sells, and nothing more.

Now, under the simple method which I propose every national bank will at once be made the agency of the Government for receiving and transmitting the farmers' mortgages, collecting and disbursing payments. Every State bank which will avail itself of the opportunity can also become such agency, and such State bank, without question, would become such agency. It would be compelled to do so in order to hold its customers.

Now, what will the farmer do if he wants a loan? He will not have to borrow 5 per cent of his proposed loan to deposit before he can secure his loan. He will not have to join any society. He will not be compelled to be stockholder in any kind of a concern. He will not be compelled to submit himself to the responsibility of taking care of the debts of other farmers. He will do just what he has to do to-day—sign an application answering, say, 40 questions, or whatever may be necessary to fully explain his situation, character of land and its condition, and ability to take care of interest and principal. He will have two of his neighbors verify his statement and give their appraisal of the cash or selling value of the land. He will then go to the bank with which he is accustomed to deal. This bank will see to the drafting of the mortgage, the examination of an abstract, and, as an agent of the Government, will also place its appraisement upon the value of the security. This bank, if the farmer is borrowing $500, will charge him $5. Not a big fee; but the bank will have this man as its customer, and will undoubtedly have enough other business with him to compensate it if this charge seems not sufficient. In nine cases out of ten if the farmer needs the money right away the bank would advance it for him the very day that he comes in.

This bank would then forward the securities, with the abstract of title, to the bureau of farm credits. That bureau would examine the abstract and the mortgage and send its draft to the bank. As soon as it had collected a sufficient number of these mortgages, this bureau would issue debentures and sell them to pay for these and to purchase other mortgages. The moment this law would become effective the bank examiners would be required, in addition to their present duties, to report the general values and character of lands within their respective districts. They would not have to go into the country and make appraisals for this purpose. No examiner can properly pass his judgment upon the paper of any bank in any State unless he knows in a general way the value and character of the lands within that section, and his knowledge can be utilized by the Government.

This is practically all there would be to the system I have mentioned. It has been suggested that there might be cases of overvaluation of lands. Well, there could not be unless there was gross negligence. One of the questions, of course, in the application would be, What is the land assessed at? That of itself would be some evidence of its value. It will be so fully and completely described and the means by which the farmer makes his livelihood would be so fully set forth that no one would be deceived unless through his own inexcusible negligence. It certainly affords greater protection in that respect than the bill reported. The banker, being the agent of the Government, is held responsible for any loss that would grow out of his negligence, and if he declared land, which he knew to be worth only $4,000, to be $8,000, and the Government should suffer any loss, he would be held responsible.

But there is another reason why the bank would not overestimate the value. There would be many times in the farmer's life when he would have to borrow an additional sum over the first mortgage on his land. The banker doing business with him and who will furnish that money will be interested that there is a good margin of value in the land over the first mortgage.

There has been some criticism of my bill, that it is paternalistic, that the Government is lending the money. Now, as a matter of fact, that criticism is not good. The Government is simply by its action bringing the farmer who wishes to borrow money into direct communication with the widow or the estate which wishes to lend money and eliminates the intermediary. Your bill reported by the committee is, on the other hand, purely paternalistic. It compels the Government to go into this banking business. It has assumed that no one will subscribe to the stock of these banks except the farmer, who is compelled to subscribe an amount equal to 5 per cent of his loan in order to borrow, and that the Government will subscribe for practically all of the stock. That puts the Government directly into the banking business for the assumed benefit of just one class of its citizens. The Government pays some of the expenses, and if the thing is a failure from the outset the Government, of course, will have to suffer the losses.

Nor, Mr. President, is the scheme I propose in any sense as paternalistic as has been the custom of the Treasury Department for years. Whenever speculation gets so rife in the great cities that there is bound to be a time when inflated values will burst the great financiers call upon the Government to empty its Treasury into the banks of the great cities that they may be able to protect themselves and for the very purpose of keeping down the rate of interest. And when matters become normal the money is returned to the Treasury.

So, too, I can find a stronger precedent in paternalistic action in the fact that the Government is now engaged in building a railroad in Alaska that will cost at least $45,000,000. We will find it again in the case of the Government guaranteeing the bonds of railroads in the Philippine Islands. If the Government can consistently guarantee railroad bonds, why not farm mortgages?

If the Government can do all of these things for the benefit of special lines of business, it certainly ought not to hesitate to issue a debenture upon farm mortgages secured by farm lands at least double the value of the security. The Government can far better do this because the land can not be destroyed. The land can not fail in business. The land can not lose its capitalization. The land will continually grow in value as the Nation grows in population.

Here, then, we have two propositions, one complex, top-heavy, expensive, and unworkable, in my opinion; the other simple, inexpensive, and which, without any possible question, will bring the results desired—cheaper rates of interest for the farmer and a sure income to the lender.

Why should we even hesitate between a simple, inexpensive, certainty and a complex, expensive uncertainty?

Mr. President, my judgment as to the inefficiency and lack of adaptability of this proposed legislation to the agricultural conditions of this country is fortified by the judgment of the farmer organizations of my own State and evidenced by petitions against its enactment from all over that State. I introduced five such petitions this morning.

But it was intimated on this floor a few days ago that as the provisions of this bill are not compulsory it could not injure anyone. That is not a pertinent answer to our criticisms. The people do want a good, workable, beneficial rural credits bill. They know if we provide one that will not be a success it will sound the death knell of any other rural credits legislation for years to come. They therefore know that improper or inefficient legislation is far worse than no legislation, and they ask that no rural credits legislation shall be enacted at this session. They ask this because they believe it would be impossible, with the other work to be done during the session, to bring forward and to get adequate consideration for any other system.

The Senator from Texas has introduced a rural credits bill patterned after the German landschaft system. He explained the provisions of that bill and showed that it was far more simple and far less expensive than the committee bill. While my judgment is that the bill proposed by the Senator from Texas is an improvement over the committee bill, I still hold to my conviction that any system based upon foreign conditions will not meet American conditions. No one questions the success of the landschaft system in Germany, but Germany is not the United States. The Senator quoted in support of his bill the comment of Mr. Wallenborg, as follows:

I have read the text of the bill. I am unable to give an opinion on matters of detail and points of procedure, as I am unacquainted with local conditions and with the psychology of the farming population to whom the measure is to apply.

Mr. President, it is just these local conditions and the psychology of our farming population which raised a suspicion in the mind of Mr. Wallenborg that we must take account of in any rural credits bill. And it is to those things that both the committee and the Senator from Texas have, in my judgment, failed to give proper weight. Local conditions are not the same in this country as in Germany. The psychology of the farming people of the United States and Germany is not similar, as I have heretofore pointed out.

In a rapidly developing country the farmers do not want their land tied up for 50 or 75 years in any kind of a system. When the American farmer wants to borrow he wants the money right away, and he wants to pay it when he can, according to his crop returns, and thereupon be released. He does not want his progress to be either stayed or accelerated by what his neighbor may do or fail to do.

The Senator from Texas yesterday stated that the system of collecting from the landschaft was similar to that in vogue in drainage districts in this country. Now, I do not believe there is a farmer in my State who would want to apply the district drainage system to the payment of the mortgage on his own land or that of his neighbors in that district. I do not believe he would want to combine his land with others to pay off his indebtedness through many years under any amortization plan. He wants to be independent of his neighbor in every respect.

And I can but repeat, Mr. President, that I regret exceedingly that in this work of providing an American rural credits bill we should have inadvertently led our minds astray by attempting to plant a European system in American soil. It would have been far better to have studied the present American system of loans, the demands and the characteristics of the American farmers, and evolved a purely American rural credits bill.

Mr. President, I ask that the bill which I have introduced on this subject, and which is extremely short, may be printed, to follow my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill referred to is as follows:

A bill (S. 831) to facilitate farm credits and decrease interest charges on farm securities.

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby created in the Treasury Department a bureau to be known as the bureau of farm credits. Said bureau shall be presided over by an officer who shall be designated commissioner of farm credits. The Secretary of the Treasury shall provide for sufficient clerical force to perform the duties of said bureau.

SEC. 2. That there is hereby appropriated and set aside for the use of said bureau, in the manner hereinafter provided, the sum of $10,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

SEC. 3. That the said sum so provided shall be used for the purpose of purchasing notes secured by first mortgages on agricultural lands, as hereinafter provided, for stationery and clerical expenses, and such other expenses as may be incident to the business of said bureau.

SEC. 4. That every National bank and every State bank desiring to avail itself of the privileges herein provided are hereby created and declared to be agencies of the Treasury Department for the purpose of receiving from mortgagors notes and mortgages securing same, advancing the moneys to the said mortgagors and transmitting said notes and mortgages to the bureau of farm credits, and receiving in return therefor the amount advanced to the mortgagor by the said bureau.

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to apportion the sum hereby appropriated among the several States according to the agricultural population, importance of the agricultural productions of each State, and percentage of agricultural lands incumbered by mortgages or trust deeds, and to pay for such notes and mortgages as may be presented to the extent of the amount apportioned to any State.

SEC. 6. That any owner of agricultural lands within the United States who is living upon and farming such lands desiring a loan under the provisions of this act shall execute a promissory note due in 10 years, bearing interest at the rate of 4½ per cent per annum, interest payable annually, which interest shall be evidenced by 10 coupon notes attached to said principal note, and which coupons shall also bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum from the date of maturity until paid, payable annually. Said note shall also provide that the principal may be paid on any interest-paying day after the expiration of five years. Said note shall be secured by a first mortgage upon the lands so farmed by the owner and executed and recorded in the manner provided by the laws of the State in which the land is situated for the execution and recording of mortgages on real estate. Such mortgage shall be accompanied by an application for loan, which application shall recite the purpose for which the loan is desired, the market value of the land, the value at which it was last assessed for taxation, the value and kind of buildings thereon, the number of acres under cultivation, the character and quality of the soil, the number of acres capable of being cultivated, and such other information as may be required by the rules of the said bureau. Said application shall have attached thereto or made as a part thereof an affidavit signed by the owner and at least two neighbors who are thoroughly acquainted with land values in the vicinity, stating the market value of such lands and the market value of the particular lands to be mortgaged. Said note, mortgage, and application shall also be accompanied by an abstract of title duly certified by an abstract company, the register of deeds, or other officer authorized by the laws of the State to make and certify abstracts of lands, which abstract shall show no other mortgages, judgments, delinquent taxes, or other liens of any character against the said lands, unless the purpose of the loan is to secure money to cancel such liens. Said owner shall then present to any National bank or State bank accepting the provisions of this act the said loan papers. The said abstract and papers shall be carefully examined by the president, cashier, or other officer of the bank for the purpose of ascertaining whether the title is perfect in the mortgagor, whether the land is affected by any liens, who shall certify the result of his examination of the abstract, and who shall further certify what, in his opinion and judgment, is the actual cash selling price of the land. And no mortgage shall be accepted for a greater amount than one-half of the value of such lands, including improvements; nor in any event to an amount exceeding one-half of the actual market value thereof. The said bank may charge the borrower for its services in examining papers and abstract and in forwarding the papers to the bureau of farm credits a sum not exceeding 1 per cent of the amount of the mortgage. No mortgage shall be less than $300 nor more than $10,000 to one person or company, and shall be in multiples of $100. The said notes and mortgages shall not be dated at the time they are executed and presented to the bank. The said bank shall forward all the said papers to the said bureau of farm credits, which bureau shall examine the abstract, note, mortgage, and application, and if said abstract shows the land to be clear or to have no liens of greater amount than the amount desired to be loaned, and all papers properly executed, it shall remit to the bank forwarding the papers the amount of the loan and shall date the notes and mortgage the date on which the remittance is made, from which date interest shall begin to accrue; and all coupons shall be dated to correspond with the date affixed to the principal instrument; and said bureau shall return, with the remittance, the abstract of title. Upon receipt of the said abstract of title by the bank, said bank shall require the abstract to be continued up to date of payment by said bank to the borrower, and if said abstract after being continued shows the land clear the bank shall indorse over to the borrower the remittance made by the bureau of farm credits. If there are any liens upon the land, the bank, out of the remittance, shall first pay and have canceled such liens and pay the balance to the borrower. The bank shall be held responsible for any negligence in the performance of its duties as agent of said bureau. The principal and all interest coupons shall be payable at the bank where and through which the loan is negotiated and remitted by said bank to said bureau.

SEC. 6. That whenever the bureau of farm credits shall have received such mortgages to the extent of $1,000,000 it shall issue bonds in the name of the United States, payable in 20 years and bearing 4 per cent interest, payable annually, with the privilege and option of the said bureau to pay the principal at the expiration of 10 years. Said bonds shall be issued in denominations from $100 to $500 each, and the said commissioner of farm credits shall sell the said bonds for the face value thereof to any person applying therefor, preference being given to those desiring small investments. Said bonds shall not be subject to taxation by the United States, a State, or municipality. All moneys received by the said commissioner in the sale of bonds and the principal and all interest paid on said mortgages shall be covered into the said fund of $10,000,000 and used in the payment of mortgages as they may be presented, the expenses of the bureau, the interest on bonds, and payment thereof at maturity.

SEC. 7. That all mortgages shall run to the commissioner of farm credits, and said commissioner shall have all the rights and authority of a mortgagee under the laws of the State wherein such mortgage is executed.

SEC. 8. That all taxes of every kind levied by a State or municipality which may become a lien prior to said mortgage shall be paid by the mortgagor at least 30 days prior to the time such lands could be sold for delinquent taxes. Upon his failure to do so, or to pay any other lien that may attach to said lands and become superior to said mortgage, the commissioner may pay the same and the mortgage shall stand as security for such sums so paid and interest thereon at 8 per cent per annum. And said mortgage shall further provide that in default of the payment of any interest or the payment of taxes, or other superior liens, as aforesaid, the commissioner may foreclose the premises pursuant to the laws of the State in which the land is situated. All papers necessary for the foreclosure proceedings shall be prepared and premises foreclosed by the proper law officer of the bureau. In lieu of foreclosure the commissioner may sell the mortgage to any person desiring to purchase the same, without recourse, and the money so received shall be covered into said fund. Upon foreclosure, the said commissioner may transfer and assign the certificate of sale to any purchaser, and after the period of redemption has expired, may sell the lands. And any sum received therefor shall in like manner be covered into said fund.

SEC. 9. That it is the purpose of this act not only to secure and facilitate borrowing upon agriculturel lands at a reasonable rate of interest, but also to afford a means for those who desire a safe investment, and so long as the said bureau shall be able to dispose of bonds at par it shall accept mortgages presented to any extent above the $10,000,000 hereby appropriated.

SEC. 10. That said bonds shall be negotiable in form, and transferable by indorsement, and may be bought and sold by Federal reserve banks under the provisions of sections 13 and 14 of the Federal reserve act, approved December 23, 1913, and may also be received as collateral for the issue of Federal reserve notes under the provisions of section 16 of said act.

SEC. 11. That the word "mortgage" shall be construed to include deeds of trust or any other instruments of security on agricultural lands.

SEC. 12. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall make all needful rules and regulations to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 13. That this act shall take effect from and after its passage and approval.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, the subject of rural credits applied in the one phase of land mortgage credits is very large; it covers a very wide field, and I shall not attempt to discuss it to any extent to-day. I wish to say, however, following the remarks of the distinguished Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] that I have had the honor of serving with four different committees—subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of the Senate—on the subject of rural credits in the last two and a half years. The bill that the Committee on Banking and Currency has reported is the result of the labors of those committees.

I wish the subject were so simple and so easily disposed of as the distinguished Senator from North Dakota seems to think it is; but my mind goes back to some years ago, when the Republican Party was in control of the Government; and if the problem had been as simple as the Senator thinks it is, that party would have doubtless extended to the farmers the relief which the Senator now advocates.

The measure which has been reported by the joint committee to the Senate and to the other House and by the Senate Banking and Currency Committee to the Senate is the result of an investigation of all existing systems; and at the proper time I think I shall be able to satisfactorily explain to the Senate in detail every provision of that bill.

Before I take my seat I desire to say that the address we listened to yesterday made by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] and the address we have listened to to-day from the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] show the diversity of views that may be entertained on this subject. The Senator from Texas would have us adopt the German landschaft system in its entirety; the Senator from North Dakota would have the Government make direct loans to the farmers. Those two addresses represent the two opposite sides of the question, and I think I shall be able to show that the bill recommended by the Senate committee represents the medial road between those two extremes and represents the true American system.

FEDERAL JUDGES.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, a few days ago, when Senate bill 706 was before the Senate, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] put in the RECORD the report of the minority of the House committee. I wish to make a brief reply to that report, and I will be glad to do so this morning; but if it will necessitate a call for a quorum, I would rather yield at once to the Indian appropriation bill. I shall only ask to take up Senate bill 706 to present a brief reply, and then I shall not desire to keep the bill longer before the Senate at this time. I now ask that Senate bill 706 be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). The Chair lays before the Senate a bill the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 706) to amend section 260 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to reply briefly to the minority report of a member of the House Judiciary Committee, which was read in the Senate at the request of the Senator from Utah.

The House minority report is based principally upon the contention that this bill is "an attempt to evade, if not a direct violation, of the Constitution of the United States."

The House minority report urges that the provision in the bill which allows the old judges to be assigned to special work and places the responsibility upon the new judges to perform the burden of the work deprives the old judges of their offices.

It, in effect, claims that the performance of all the duties of a circuit or district judge is essential to a continuation in the office of a circuit or district court judge.

It also asserts that the "good behavior" referred to in the Constitution means "good moral conduct," and followed to its logical consequence means that a judge, no matter how old and how inefficient, mentally or physically, if his moral conduct is still good, can not be relieved by Congress from any of the duties pertaining to the office.

If this position were sound, the Constitution has authorized Congress "from time to time" to ordain and establish inferior courts and has left no power vested in Congress to provide for the efficient administration of the business of the courts.

When a district is created and provision made for the appointment of a judge for the district, it is reasonable to suppose that the judicial work of the district is sufficient to occupy the time of a man, able mentally and physically.

The argument of the minority report leads to the conclusion that this judge must be left in charge of all the business of a district, or, at least, authorized to interfere with all the business, although he has ceased to possess the mental and physical capacity to do the work, it only being necessary that his moral conduct should be good.

Such a construction of the Constitution would defeat the due administration of justice.

The minority report in the House refers to the case of Martin against Hunter (1 Wheat., p. 328). In the same decision Justice Story uses the following language:

The judicial power of the United States shall be vested (not may be vested) in one Supreme Court and in such inferor courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. Could Congress have lawfully refused to create a Supreme Court or vest in it the constitutional authority? * * * The judicial power must, therefore, be vested in some court by Congress, and to suppose that it was not an obligation binding upon them but might at their pleasure be kept or declined, is to suppose that under the sanction of the Constitution they might defeat the Constitution itself. * * * They might establish one or more inferior courts. They might parcel out the jurisdiction among such courts from time to time at their own pleasure, but the whole judicial power of the United States should be at all times vested in either original or appellate form in some courts created under its authority.

Inferior courts, by the terms of the Constitution, are to be ordained and established from time to time as Congress may see fit. The Constitution does not say they are to be ordained and established and stop there, but the words "from time to time" are used, that the power and duty to change after they are ordained and established may clearly be preserved to Congress.

Congress speaking for the people fixes the jurisdiction of the courts, changes the courts, abolishes them if it sees fit, classifies the work in the court if it sees fit. Indeed, it has unlimited authority with reference to the jurisdiction of the courts and the work of the judges, except that a judge is to hold his office during "good behavior."

This bill in no sense takes the office of judge away from an older judge, but it requires that when an old judge ceases to be able to efficiently administer the business of the court, a new judge shall be appointed.

If it is the constitutional duty of Congress to provide courts in which the judicial responsibilities of the Government are to be enforced, it follows as a necessary consequence that the duty rests upon Congress to see that those courts are open for the trial of causes, civil and criminal, and that opportunity through them is given for the efficient administration of the business required to be performed in the courts.

If the work requires an additional judge Congress should provide for his appointment, and it follows necessarily that the power is in Congress to distribute the work between the judges.

This bill provides that where a judge of a circuit or district court has passed 70 and is entitled to retire on full pay but fails to do so there shall be an additional judge appointed where required to give efficiency to the administration of the business of the court.

The bill then provides for the distribution of the work between the two judges.

It places the burden of the work on the new judge and leaves the old judge to do such work as may be specially assigned to him, and for which his age, ability, and strength fit him.

As there are to be two judges in a single district, provision for the distribution of the work between them is essential. Otherwise, conflicts between the judges would be inevitable.

The Constitution does not say that a judge after appointment must retain all the work of the office, or that Congress can not classify the work between two judges. It only provides that the old judge shall retain office. The entire control of the subject, barring the right of the judge to hold office during good behavior, is with Congress.

The only limitation on the power of Congress is the provision which gives the judge a life position if his behavior is good.

Legislation by Congress exercising the fullest power of providing additional judges and providing for the classification of their work, has heretofore been passed in a number of instances.

Special acts have been passed, due in each instance to the age or the infirmity of a judge, by which provision has been made for the appointment of a second judge for the same court. These acts have provided further that the presiding judge of the circuit court of appeals may distribute the work.

The Judicial Code contains a provision that wherever two judges have been appointed in the same district the chief judge of the circuit court of appeals of the circuit can assign work to each if they do not agree with reference to a division.

Congress not only has asserted the power to distribute the work between two judges in a district but it has authorized the power of distribution to be exercised by a judge of the circuit court of appeals.

Before the creation of the circuit court of appeals, circuit court judges did nisi prius work and had nisi prius jurisdiction throughout their circuits. This jurisdiction was largely taken from them, and they were left only to serve in nisi prius when specially designated by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court.

Congress established the Court of Commerce, and provided a certain number of judges of the circuit court of appeals to sit upon this court.

Afterwards it abolished the Court of Commerce and left these judges afloat to do only such work as might be assigned to them by the Chief Justice.

Judges who formerly presided over the Commerce Court are now judges assigned to no circuit court of appeals. They are judges afloat. They do only work when specially assigned to it. Do they still hold their offices?

When one of them is assigned by the Chief Justice to preside in any circuit or to hold a nisi prius court, is he not still a judge of the circuit court of appeals?

The question answers itself.

After the bill now before the Senate passes and one of the older circuit court judges or district court judges is assigned to a special piece of work, either by the presiding judge of the circuit court of appeals or by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, does anyone question that under this legislation he could perform the duties to which he was assigned?

If this is true, then he still retains the office which he now holds, and this legislation does not take from him his office, and clearly, therefore, it does not violate the provision of the Constitution which guarantees a judge to hold office during good behavior.

Once more I call attention to the fact that this legislation was recommended by Mr. Attorney General McReynolds, and also recommended twice by Mr. Attorney General Gregory. We have, therefore, the opinion of the Department of Justice, three times given, that this law is constitutional; that the legal position taken by the minority report of the House is unsound and that legislation is necessary to prevent the administration of justice from suffering as a consequence of judges remaining upon the bench long beyond the time when they are capable of adequately discharging their duties.

INDIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10385) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there are only about half a dozen Senators in the Chamber, and perhaps many Senators do not know that the Indian appropriation bill is up. For that reason I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Jones	Page	Stone
Borah	Kenyon	Pittman	Sutherland
Brandegee	Kern	Poindexter	Swanson
Catron	Lane	Pomerene	Thomas
Chamberlain	Lippitt	Saulsbury	Thompson
Chilton	Martin, Va.	Shafroth	Townsend
Clapp	Martine, N. J.	Sheppard	Underwood
Cummins	Myers	Sherman	Vardaman
Curtis	Nelson	Shields	Wadsworth
Hardwick	Norris	Simmons	Walsh
Hitchcock	Oliver	Smith, Ga.	Warren
Hollis	Overman	Smoot	Williams
Husting	Owen	Sterling

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], who is unavoidably detained because of official business. He is paired with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY].

I also desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. He is absent from the city.

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. GOFF], on account of illness.

Mr. STONE. I announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. REED], who has been called from the city on important business. I wish to have this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. CATRON. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. FALL], who probably will be absent for several days.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-one Senators have responded to the roll call. A quorum is present.

Mr. ASHURST. I ask that the Secretary resume the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed, at line 21, on page 71.

The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 72, after line 12, to insert:

The sum of $275,000, to be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by him, in aid of the common schools in the Cherokee, Creek, Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Seminole Nations and the Quapaw Agency in Oklahoma, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917: Provided, That this appropriation shall not be subject to the limitation in section 1 of this act limiting the expenditure of money to educate children of less than one-fourth Indian blood.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 72, after line 22, to insert:

The authority contained in the act of March 3, 1911 (36 Stats. L., pp. 1058–1070), for the use of the interest accruing on funds of the Five Civilized Tribes on deposit in banks to defray expenses of per capita payments to the Indians of the proceeds of the sale of their surplus unallotted land, shall be deemed sufficient to include salaries and wages of any employees actually and necessarily engaged in the work of making such per capita payments.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 74, line 20, after the word "prescribe," to insert "And provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby empowered, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, to expend funds of the Chickasaw, Choctaw, Creek, and Seminole Nations available for school purposes under existing law for such repairs, improvements, or new buildings as he may deem essential for the proper conduct of the several schools of said tribes," so as to make the clause read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to use not exceeding $35,000 of the proceeds of sales of unallotted lands and other tribal property belonging to any of the Five Civilized Tribes for payment of salaries of employees and other expenses of advertising and sale in connection with the further sales of such tribal lands and property, including the advertising and sale of the land within the segregated coal and asphalt area of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, or of the surface thereof as provided for in the act of Congress approved February 19, 1912 (37 U. S. Stats. L., p. 67), and of the improvements thereon, which is hereby expressly authorized, and for other work necessary to a final settlement of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes: Provided, That not to exceed $10,000 of such amount may be used in connection with the collection of rents of unallotted lands and tribal buildings: Provided further, That during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, no moneys shall be expended from tribal funds belonging to the Five Civilized Tribes without specific appropriation by Congress, except as follows: Equalization of allotments, per capita and other payments authorized by law to individual members of the respective tribes, tribal and other Indian schools for the current fiscal year under existing law, salaries and contingent expenses of governors, chiefs, assistant chiefs, secretaries, interpreters, and mining trustees of the tribes for the current fiscal year at salaries at the rate heretofore paid, and attorneys for said tribes employed under contract approved by the President, under existing law, for the current fiscal year: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to pay the cost of maintenance during the current fiscal year of the tribal and other schools and to continue during the ensuing fiscal year the tribal and other schools among the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Creek, and Seminole Tribes from the tribal funds of those nations, within his discretion and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby empowered, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, to expend funds of the Chickasaw, Choctaw, Creek, and Seminole Nations available for school purposes under existing law for such repairs, improvements, or new buildings as he may deem essential for the proper conduct of the several schools of said tribes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 75, after line 22, to insert:

For the salaries and expenses of not to exceed six oil and gas inspectors, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to supervise oil and gas mining operations on allotted lands leased by members of the Five Civilized Tribes from which restrictions have not been removed, and to conduct investigations with a view to the prevention of waste, $25,000.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, on page 76, line 1, after the word "allotted," I move to insert "or tribal"; and after the words "lands" I move to insert "in the State of Oklahoma"; and I move to strike out the words "leased by members of the Five Civilized Tribes," so that, if amended, it will read:

Allotted or tribal lands in the State of Oklahoma.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 76, line 1, after the word "allotted," it is proposed to insert "or tribal"; after the word "lands," to insert "in the State of Oklahoma," and to strike out the words "leased by members of the Five Civilized Tribes."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that is a restriction, and I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill why it should be made. Why not allow the appropriation to be used as provided for in the amendment, and apply to all members of the Five Civilized Tribes, rather than the way the Senator now proposes?

Mr. ASHURST. If the Senator is correct in his view, I have no objection. At present it would relate and restrict the matter solely to the lands leased by members of the Five Civilized Tribes, whereas if the amendment which I have proposed were adopted it would apply to allotted or tribal lands leased in the whole State of Oklahoma, whether of the Five Civilized Tribes or otherwise.

I think, if the Senator will pardon me, this is an enlargement, and the way it is written in the bill it is a restriction.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. I hope the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona to the amendment will not be agreed to. It is limited to the lands allotted and unallotted to the Five Civilized Tribes, and if you extend it and let it apply to all of Oklahoma you will have to increase the force very materially, in my judgment.

Mr. ASHURST. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona withdraws the amendment to the amendment. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 76, after line 11, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to effectuate a compromise settlement of the suit of the United States v. E. Dowden and others decided adversely to the Government on January 4, 1915, by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit and now pending on appeal in the Supreme Court of the United States, and for said purpose to purchase whatever right, title, and interest that said E. Dowden may have in or to the land involved in said suit, said land being situated within the area segregated for town-site purposes at Tuttle, Okla., and to take such other action as may be necessary to quiet the title in the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations to said land and in the purchasers from said nations at the Government sale of the town lots; and for the above purpose the sum of $57,500, together with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from February 24, 1916, to date of settlement, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That the United States is to be reimbursed to the extent of the proceeds heretofore derived, or which may hereafter be derived, from the sale of the town lots within the area affected by such compromise settlement.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it is very seldom that the rate of interest is provided in any bill passed by Congress. I will ask the Senator from Oklahoma to state why a rate of interest at 6 per cent is included in this amendment.

Mr. OWEN. It is because of an agreement made between the Government and Dowden, who has recovered judgment against the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. Is the interest to run only from the date of the judgment?

Mr. OWEN. From the date of the agreement. They made a compromise agreement, subject to approval by Congress, and the Government officials say if the agreement does not go through it will probably subject the Government to additional costs, amounting in all to a sum in the neighborhood of $100,000.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not objecting to the amendment.

Mr. OWEN. I know the Senator is entirely right in regard to the United States paying interest on any obligation, but this is not an obligation of the United States primarily; it is a judgment against the United States for a much larger sum, and this is a compromise agreement which the Government officers have made, and, if it is accepted by Congress, interest should be paid from that date.

Mr. SMOOT. It bears interest only from the date of the agreement?

Mr. OWEN. That is all.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Oregon," on page 77, line 12, to change the number of the section from 19 to 20.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 77, line 24, after the word "improvements," to strike out "$12,000; for remodeling sewer system, $5,000; in all, $119,000" and insert "$15,000; for remodeling sewer system, $5,000; for three high-pressure steam boilers, $7,200; for new laundry machinery, $2,000; for one new rotary brick oven, $1,800: Provided, That the unused balance of $9,830 of the amount appropriated by the act of August 1, 1914 (38 Stat. L., p. 602), and an additional amount of $2,500 may be expended for an addition to the assembly hall; in all, $135,500," so as to make the clause read:

For support and education of 600 Indian pupils, including native Indian pupils brought from Alaska, at the Indian school, Salem, Oreg., including pay of superintendent, $102,000; for general repairs and improvements, $15,000; for remodeling sewer system, $5,000; for three high-pressure steam boilers, $7,200; for new laundry machinery, $2,000; for one new rotary brick oven, $1,800: Provided, That the unused balance of $9,830 of the amount appropriated by the act of August 1, 1914 (38 Stat. L., p. 602), and an additional amount of $2,500 may be expended for an addition to the assembly hall; in all, $135,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 78, line 25, after the word "act," to strike out "in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, shall be deposited in the Treasury to the credit of said Indians" and insert "shall be paid, share and share alike, to the enrolled members of the tribe," so as to make the clause read:

For support and civilization of Indians at Grande Ronde and Siletz Agencies, Oreg., including pay of employees, $4,000: Provided, That section 3 of an act entitled "An act to authorize the sale of certain lands belonging to the Indians of the Siletz Indian Reservation in the State of Oregon," approved May 13, 1910, be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out all of said section and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 3. That when such lands are surveyed and platted they shall be appraised and sold, except land reserved for water-power sites as provided in section 2 of this act, under the provisions of the Revised Statutes covering the sale of town sites located on the public domain. That the proceeds derived from the sale of any lands hereunder, after reimbursing the United States for the expense incurred in carrying out the provisions of this act, shall be paid, share and share alike, to the enrolled members of the tribe."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 79, after line 11, to insert:

That the sum of $1,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of the tribal funds of the Klamath Indians of the State of Oregon, is hereby appropriated to pay the actual expenses of the two delegates of the said tribe who have been elected by the general council of the Klamath Indians to attend to the business of the tribe and pay their expenses to Washington in February and March, 1916, to present the affairs of the said Klamath Indians of the State of Oregon to the officials of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 79, after line 20, to insert:

For the construction of a bridge across the Williamson River on the Klamath Indian Reservation, Oreg., $3,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be immediately available and to remain available until expended, reimbursable to the United States by the Indians having tribal rights on said reservation, and to remain a charge and lien upon the lands and funds belonging to said Indians until paid.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 80, line 14, after the words "at least," to strike out "one-third" and insert "one-half," so as to read:

For the construction of two bridges on the Umatilla Indian Reservation, in Oregon, suitable for wagon and other purposes, across the Umatilla River, at a limit of cost of $28,000, the first at or near Thorn Hollow Station, the second at or near Mission Station, the sum of $18,666 is hereby appropriated to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior and to be reimbursable from any funds now or hereafter placed in the Treasury to the credit of said Indians: Provided, That no part of the money herein appropriated shall be expended until the Secretary of the Interior shall have obtained from the proper authorities of the State of Oregon, or from the county of Umatilla, at least one-half of the cost of said bridges, and that the proper authorities of the said State of Oregon or the said county of Umatilla shall assume full responsibility for, and agree at all times to maintain and repair, said bridges and construct and maintain the approaches thereto: Provided further, That any and all expenses above the amount herein named in connection with the building and maintenance of said bridges shall be borne by the said State of Oregon or the said county of Umatilla.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ASHURST. May I ask the attention of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE]? In line 7, page 80, I move to strike out the numerals "$18,666" and insert "$14,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 80, after line 22, to insert:

That jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Court of Claims, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, to consider and adjudicate any claim, arising under treaty stipulations or otherwise, which the Klamath Band of Indians, or other bands of Indians residing in the State of Oregon, have against the United States; and such suit or suits as may be instituted hereunder shall, if the convenience of the court admit, be advanced upon the docket of either of said courts for trial, and be determined at the earliest practicable time.

That upon the final determination of such suit or suits the Court of Claims shall decree such fees as the court shall find to be reasonable, to be paid to the attorney or attorneys employed by the said band of Indians, and the same shall be paid out of the sum found to be due said band of Indians when an appropriation therefor shall have been made by Congress: Provided, That in no case shall the fees decreed by the court exceed in amount such sum or sums as may have been fixed therefor under the terms of any contract entered into between the Indians and their attorney in conformity with section 2103 and the following of the Revised Statutes of the United States for the prosecution of their claim.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Pennsylvania," on page 81, line 22, to change the number of the section from "20" to "21."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "South Dakota," on page 82, line 2, to change the number of the section from 21 to 22; in line 4, after the word "superintendent," to strike out "$61,500" and insert "$62,955"; and in line 5, after the words "in all," to strike out "$67,500" and insert "$68,955: Provided, That the unexpended balance of the $10,000 appropriated by the act approved August 1, 1914, for repairing buildings and replacing equipment destroyed or damaged by the tornado of June 10, 1914, at Flandreau Indian School, S. Dak., is hereby reappropriated and made immediately available for the purchase and installation of a water tank and the purchase of dairy cattle for said school," so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 22. For support and education of 365 Indian pupils at the Indian school at Flandreau, S. Dak., and for pay of superintendent, $62,955; for general repairs and improvements, $6,000; in all, $68,955: Provided, That the unexpended balance of the $10,000 appropriated by the act approved August 1, 1914, for repairing buildings and replacing equipment destroyed or damaged by the tornado of June 10, 1914, at Flandreau Indian School, S. Dak., is hereby reappropriated and made immediately available for the purchase and installation of a water tank and the purchase of dairy cattle for said school.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 82, line 19, after the word "new," to strike out "boiler" and insert "boilers"; in line 20, after $1,000, to strike out "in all, $55,750" and insert "for barn, $5,000; in all, $60,750," so as to make the clause read:

For support and education of 250 Indian pupils at the Indian school at Pierre, S. Dak., including pay of superintendent, $43,750; for general repairs and improvements, $6,000; for steel water tank, $2,000; for new boilers and installation thereof, $3,000; for addition to shop building, $1,000; for barn, $5,000; in all, $60,750.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 84, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to provide adequate school facilities for Indian children now without Government or public-school facilities in the Sioux Indian country, and there is hereby appropriated $250,000 for this purpose, which shall include the purchase of necessary sites, to be immediately available.

Mr. GRONNA. The hyphen between "public" and "school" in line 3 should be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Utah," on page 85, line 14, to change the number of the section from 22 to 23.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 87, after line 9, to insert:

For a proportionate share of the amount required to construct an interstate wagon road or highway through the Kaibab Indian Reservation, Utah, the sum of $9,000: Provided, That such sum shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior in such manner and at such times as he may deem proper in the employment of Indian labor for the construction of said road or highway.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 87, line 22, after the word "expended," to insert:

Provided, That this appropriation shall be used to hold, maintain, and operate said systems so as to secure to the Indians their paramount rights to so much of the waters of the streams in said reservation as may be needed by them for agricultural and domestic purposes, and to regulate the use, enlargement, and extension of said systems by any person, association, or corporation under the provisions of the act of June 21, 1906 (34 Stat. L., p. 325), only upon the acquisition of a right thereto as provided in the act of March 1, 1899 (30 Stat. L., p. 941).

So as to make the clause read:

For continuing the construction of lateral distributing systems to irrigate the allotted lands of the Uncompahgre, Uintah, and White River Utes, in Utah, and to maintain existing irrigation systems, authorized under the act of June 21, 1906, reimbursable as therein provided, $40,000, to remain available until expended: Provided, That this appropriation shall be used to hold, maintain, and operate said systems, etc.

Mr. SMOOT. I make a point of order on the proposed amendment, the proviso beginning on page 87, line 23, down to and including line 10 on page 88.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the point of order?

Mr. SMOOT. The point of order is that it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. ASHURST. I confess that the amendment is subject to the point of order. I admit that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The next amendment was, on page 88, after line 10, to insert:

To reimburse the board of education of Box Elder County, State of Utah, for education of 23 Indian pupils at the Washakie School, Box Elder County, during the school year of 1913 and 1914, and for the education of 21 Indian pupils at the same school during the school year of 1914 and 1915, $1,684.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 88, after line 18, to insert:

For the education of 22 Indian pupils at the Indian school at Washakie, Box Elder County, for the school year 1915 and 1916, or so much thereof as may be necessary, $832.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 88, after line 22, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to protect the north abutment of the Government bridge at Myton, Utah, from high water, $1,000, to be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Washington," on page 89, line 2, to change the number of the section from 23 to 24.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 89, line 15, after the word "Washington," to strike out "$13,000" and insert "$15,000," so as to make the clause read:

For support and civilization of Indians at Colville, Taholah, Puyallup, and Spokane Agencies, including pay of employees, and for purchase of agricultural implements, and support and civilization of Joseph's Band of Nez Perce Indians in Washington, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 94, after line 5, to insert:

That there is hereby appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $95,000, to be used by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, in the acquisition of water rights for the lands heretofore allotted to Indians, situated within the boundaries of the West Okanogan Valley irrigation district, Okanogan County, Wash., and for the payment of the proportionate operation and maintenance charges of the said district. The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to negotiate for said water rights and to pay therefor as he may deem appropriate, such part of the sum herein appropriated as he may determine to be necessary for the best interests of the Indians: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize any lien or claims upon or against said allotted lands not herein specifically appropriated for: Provided further, That the amounts expended under this appropriation shall be reimbursed to the United States by the owners of the land on behalf of which such expenditure is made, upon such terms as the Secretary may prescribe, which shall be not less favorable to the Indians than the reimbursement required of settlers upon lands irrigated under the provisions of the Reclamation Act of June 17, 1902 (32 Stat. L., p. 388), and acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto; and if any Indian shall sell his allotment or part thereof, or receive a patent in fee for the same, any amount of the charge made to secure reimbursement remaining unpaid at the time of such sale or issuance of patent shall be a lien on the land, and patents issued therefor shall recite the amount of such item.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Wisconsin," on page 95, line 13, to change the number of the section from 24 to 25.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 96, after line 3, to insert:

There is hereby appropriated the sum of $95,000, to be used in addition to the tribal funds of the Stockbridge and Munsee Tribes of Indians, for the payment of the members of the Stockbridge and Munsee Tribes of Indians who were enrolled under the act of Congress of March 3, 1893, equal amounts to the amounts paid to the other members of said tribe prior to the enrollment under said act, and such payments shall be made upon the certificate and order of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs upon claims being filed with him, showing to his satisfaction that such claimants, or the ancestors of such claimants, were enrolled under the act of March 3, 1893, entitled, "An act for the relief of the Stockbridge and Munsee Tribes of Indians of the State of Wisconsin."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 96, after line 18, to insert:

For the purchase of pure-bred dairy cattle for the Oneida Indian School, Wisconsin, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 97, line 12, after the word "self-supporting," to insert:

Provided, That in order to train said Indians in the use and handling of money, not exceeding $25,000 of the above appropriation may be paid to them per capita, or be deposited to their credit subject to expenditure in such manner and under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

So as to make the clause read:

For the support and civilization of those portions of the Wisconsin Band of Pottawatomie Indians residing in the States of Wisconsin and Michigan, and to aid said Indians in establishing homes on the lands purchased for them under the provisions of the Act of Congress approved June 30, 1913, $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, said sum to be reimbursed to the United States out of the appropriation, when made, of the principal due as the proportionate share of said Indians in annuities and moneys of the Pottawatomie Tribe in which they have not shared, as set forth in House document No. 830 (60th Cong., 1st sess.), and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to expend the said sum of $100,000 in the clearing of land and the purchase of houses, building material, seed, animals, machinery, tools, implements, and other equipment and supplies necessary to enable said Indians to become self-supporting: Provided, That in order to train said Indians in the use and handling of money, not exceeding $25,000 of the above appropriation may be paid to them per capita, or be deposited to their credit subject to expenditure in such manner and under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 97, after line 17, to insert:

There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $125,000, in full settlement of the claims against the United States of the St. Croix Chippewa Indians of Wisconsin whose names appear upon the final roll prepared by the Secretary of the Interior pursuant to the provisions of the act of Congress approved August 1, 1914, and which final roll is contained in the report of the Secretary of the Interior to the House of Representatives, dated March 3, 1915, the same being House Document No. 1663 (63d Cong., 3d sess.). That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to distribute said funds per capita among said Indians appearing upon said final roll, or in his discretion, the per capita share of each said Indian may be credited to him and expended by said Secretary for his benefit in such manner, including the purchase of land, as he may deem proper: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to strike from the said final roll of the St. Croix Chippewas the name of Maggie Staples, No. 39 thereon, and also to strike therefrom the name or names of any other Indians who shall hereafter be found to have received an allotment of lands on any Indian reservation: And provided further, That no part of the money hereby appropriated shall be paid to any persons whose names shall be so stricken from the final roll by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CURTIS. I make a point of order against that amendment that it is a claim.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the point of order?

Mr. CURTIS. It is a claim. It is shown on the face of the item that it is a claim, which has no place on an appropriation bill.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, just a moment. This is an item that does not pertain of course to my State. It was put on, I think, by request of the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. He is not here. I should like to call the attention of the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] to the amendment.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I did not hear the statement of the Senator from Minnesota on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. CLAPP. We are now on page 97 of the bill, embracing the appropriation of $125,000 for the St. Croix Chippewa Indians of Wisconsin, to which item a point of order has been made by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] and to which I wish to invite the attention of the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING], his colleague [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] not being present. I am not certain whether or not the junior Senator from Wisconsin is familiar with the matter.

Mr. HUSTING. I will say to the Senator from Minnesota that I am not familiar with it.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I might say to the Senator from Wisconsin that there is no question that this item is a claim. I would not raise the point of order against it if it were not for the fact that the membership rolls in this case have not yet been fully settled, and it seems to me that it would be unwise to put a claim on an appropriation bill until we fully know where the money is going and until such rolls are fully settled.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I desire to say that the senior Senator from Wisconsin will return early next week, and I would suggest to the Senator that the item be passed over for the present.

Mr. ASHURST. I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin that we are going to pass the bill to-day. Will the Senator from Kansas withdraw his point of order for 20 or 30 minutes, so that I may furnish the Senator from Wisconsin certain data that the committee had before it when it acted on the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas accede to the suggestion of the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing, if it is so desired, to pass the amendment over for the present, but whenever the amendment is considered I shall insist on the point of order, and I thought we might as well settle it now as any other time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the amendment being passed over temporarily? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 99, line 9, after the word "prescribe," to insert:

Provided, That no lands shall be cleared for agricultural purposes, pursuant to the foregoing provision, excepting such lands as have been heretofore completely and wholly cut over.

So as to make the clause read:

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to withdraw from the Treasury of the United States, in his discretion, the sum of $300,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of the tribal funds of the Menominee Indians in Wisconsin, arising under the provisions of the acts of June 12, 1890 (26 Stat. L., p. 146), and March 28, 1908 (35 Stat. L., p. 51), and to expend the same in the clearing of land, the erection of sanitary homes, and the purchase of building material, seed, teams, farming equipment, dairy stock, machinery, tools, implements, and other equipment and supplies necessary to enable said Indians to become self-supporting, under such regulations as he may prescribe: Provided, That no lands shall be cleared for agricultural purposes, pursuant to the foregoing provision, excepting such lands as have been heretofore completely and wholly cut over.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 99, after line 12, to insert:

Section 3 of the act of March 28, 1908 (35 Stat. L., p. 51), is hereby amended to read: "That the lumber, lath, shingles, crating, ties, piles, poles, posts, bolts, logs, bark, pulp wood, and other marketable materials obtained from the forests on the Menominee Reservation shall be sold under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe. The net proceeds of the sale of all forest products shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Menominee Tribe of Indians. Such proceeds shall bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, and the interest shall be used for the benefit of such Indians in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 100, after line 2, to insert:

That, without bias or prejudice to the rights or interests of any party to the litigation now pending, the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized to sell the timber on the so-called "school lands" and "swamp lands" within the boundaries of the Bad River and Lac du Flambeau Indian Reservations in Wisconsin, and to which the State of Washington has asserted a claim; to keep a separate account of the proceeds of such sale with each legal subdivision of such land, and to deposit the said proceeds at interest in a national bank, bonded for the safe-keeping of individual Indian moneys, to be paid over, together with the interest thereon, to the party who shall finally be adjudged to be the owner of such land: Provided, That the consent of the State or parties claiming title therefrom be obtained before any such sale shall be made.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, that seems to me rather a strange provision, and I should like to have a little explanation of it. Apparently there is a controversy between the United States, as the representative of the Indians, and the State of Wisconsin as to the ownership of this land, and it is provided that the timber shall be sold and the amount of proceeds deposited.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. PAGE. I want to say to the Senator from Montana that I have personally visited this reservation, and I confess that it is unlike any other reservation in the United States, and this legislation is unlike any other legislation. The purpose of this legislation is to try out the management of a lumber project by the Indians themselves. I think a great deal of honest labor has been devoted to this matter to see if we could not make it practicable for the Indians to conduct their own business affairs. I think, although I am not certain about it, that if the Senator should go to the bottom of this matter and make a careful investigation he would find that there is nothing wrong in the proposed legislation, and that the proposed experiment ought to be tried out. I know that for a few years this experiment proved to be a bad failure. A large mill was built at Menomonie, which was run by the Indians, with the exception of white superintendents. The loss at first, I think, was quite large, but I have recently been informed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] that much improvement is being made in the management of this enterprise and that it now bids fair to be a success. I hope the Senator from Montana will allow the experiment to be tried out still further, especially since it is the wish of the Wisconsin Senators that this be done.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. PAGE. I yield?

Mr. CURTIS. I want to state that this is an amendment relating to the sale of timber. Under the existing law such timber must be sold at public auction to the highest bidder for cash, while other people who have timber for sale are selling it on time. As a result of that law, the Indians are losing $50,000 a year. The department believes that this amendment will enable the Indians to sell their timber in competition with others and to thereby obtain purchasers. There is great danger to the timber that is reserved. There are now over 45,000,000 feet of it that is liable to the ravages of fire, because it can not be sold for cash. I understand that the department is very anxious to have the proposed amendment made in the act of 1908.

Mr. ASHURST. If the Senator from Vermont will permit me, I will state that the proposed sale will in no wise interfere with the litigation, because the proceeds of the sale will be deposited and await the result of the litigation. I read a short extract in reference to the matter as follows:

The justification for this item is found on page 408 of the House hearings. The timber in that country has been very largely manufactured, and unless this timber on the school lands and swamp lands where there is controversy as to the ownership is sold soon the opportunity for selling it at the highest price may not be much longer available. The provision was in the bill last year and was agreed to by the conferees. Suits have been instituted involving the title to the timber, and it is thought best to sell it, cover the money received into the banks under proper security to the Government, and hold it subject to the termination of the litigation. The emergency exists for the sale at the present state of the lumber market, when the best price likely to be had will be received.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I want to correct the statement which I made. I thought the question was on the amendment at the bottom of page 99, beginning in line 13, on that page, and ending in line 2, on page 100. My statement applied to that amendment. I know nothing about the other amendment.

Mr. PAGE. I also wish to say that it was to the amendment to which the Senator from Kansas has just referred that I was addressing my remarks—to the clause relative to the Menominee Reservation in Wisconsin. I now find that that amendment has been agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I was about to remark that the explanation made by both the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] seemed to be quite inconsistent with the language of the amendment.

I will say, however, that I was not speaking about the wisdom of the proposition from an economic standpoint; it may be a very good thing to authorize the sale of this timber; but evidently here is the situation: There is a controversy between the United States, representing the Indians, on the one side, and the State of Wisconsin on the other, concerning the ownership of this timber, and it is proposed to sell the timber and to put the proceeds of the sale into a court to await the event of that litigation.

Mr. OWEN. That is by consent of the parties.

Mr. WALSH. It is as to that I wished to inquire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to. The Chair hears none.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 100, after line 17, to insert:

The allotment of any Indian on the Lac du Flambeau Reservation, in the State of Wisconsin, or any part of such an allotment, with the consent of the allottee, or in case of death, of his heirs, may be leased for residence or business purposes for terms not exceeding 20 years, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, and with the consent of the Indians of the Lac du Flambeau Tribe, to be obtained in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may require, the unallotted tribal lands within the said reservation may be leased under like conditions and for similar terms and purposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 101, after line 3, to insert:

For the repair and construction of sidewalks in the village of Odanah, within the Bad River Reservation, $1,000, said sum to be reimbursed to the United States from any moneys which are now or which may hereafter be placed to the credit of the Bad River Band of Wisconsin Chippewa Indians.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 101, after line 9, to insert:

For the completion of the road on the Red Cliff Reservation, $6,500, to be reimbursed out of the funds of the Indians of said reservation, under such rules, regulations, and conditions as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Wyoming," on page 101, line 5, to change the number of the section from 25 to 26.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 102, line 5, after the word "Wyoming," to strike out "$1,721.66" and insert "$1,721," so as to make the clause read:

For repairs at the old abandoned military post of Fort Washakie, on the Wind River Reservation, Wyo., $1,721.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 102, line 18, after the words "Wind River Reservation," to insert "including the ceded lands of said reservation," and in line 20, after the word "Wyoming," to strike out "$3,000" and insert "$5,000," so as to make the clause read:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to have prepared and submitted to Congress at the beginning of the next regular session plans and estimates of the character and cost of structures necessary for completing the irrigation of all of the irrigable lands of the Shoshone or Wind River Reservation, including the ceded lands of said reservation, in Wyoming, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 103, to insert:

For the payment of salary and expenses of Joseph H. Norris as supervisor of Indian schools, October 21, to November 11, inclusive, 1912, $257.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 103, after line 4, to strike out:

SEC. 26. Annually on the first Monday in December, the Secretary of the Interior shall transmit to the Speaker of the House of Representatives estimates of the amounts of receipts to, and expenditures which the said Secretary recommends to be made for the benefit of the Indians from, all tribal funds of Indians for the ensuing fiscal year; and such statement shall show (first) the total amounts estimated to be received from any and all sources whatsoever, which will be placed to the credit of each tribe of Indians, in trust or otherwise, at the close of the ensuing fiscal year, (second) an analysis showing the amounts which the Federal Government is directed and required by treaty stipulations and agreements to expend from each of said funds or from the Federal Treasury, giving references to the existing treaty or agreement or statute, (third) the amounts which the Secretary recommends to be spent from each of the tribal funds held in trust or otherwise, and the purpose for which said amounts are to be expended, and said statement shall show the amounts which he recommends to be disbursed (a) for per capita payments in money to the Indians, (b) for salaries or compensation of officers and employees, (c) for compensation of counsel and attorney fees, and (d) for support and civilization: Provided, That from and after July 1, 1917, the Secretary of the Interior shall not expend any of the moneys which may be to the credit of any Indian tribe, whether received or held as a tribal fund or otherwise, except such amounts as are specifically authorized by Congress, and that all acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 104, after line 8, to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 27. That section 26 of the Indian appropriation act approved June 30, 1913 (38 Stat. L., p. 103), is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"On or before the 1st day of July, 1917, the Secretary of the Interior shall cause a system of bookkeeping and accounting to be installed in the Bureau of Indian Affairs which will afford a ready analysis of expenditures by appropriations and by units of the service, showing for each activity or class of work the expenditures for salaries and wages of employees; construction, repair, and rent of buildings; traveling expenses; transportation of supplies; stationery, printing, and binding; telegraphing and telephoning; heat, light, and power service; dry goods, clothing, and subsistence; purchase, repair, and operation of passenger-carrying vehicles; equipment; fuel; forage; schoolroom supplies, medical supplies; and for other purposes. Such further analysis and such additional changes and improvements in the system of bookkeeping and accounting shall be made as may be advisable in the judgment of the said Secretary.

"On the first Monday in December, 1918, and annually thereafter, a detailed statement of expenditures, as heretofore described, for the preceding fiscal year shall be transmitted to Congress by the Secretary of the Interior.

"The sum of $12,000 is hereby appropriated for expenses of installing the new system of bookkeeping and accounting required by this section, including the pay of expert accountants, at a rate of not exceeding $15 per day, and their assistants, to be employed by the Secretary of the Interior; transportation and sleeping-car fare of such employees when traveling under orders of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs; and the purchase of such books, stationery, and other supplies as may be necessary."

Mr. LANE. I move to strike out all of that provision included between lines 5 and 18, on page 105, and to insert in its place a provision which I send to the desk. I move this amendment for the reason that there is an expenditure of $12,000 provided for installing a new system of bookkeeping, and I am informed that there is a board of efficiency organized especially for that purpose. If the work is turned over to that board, it will be done without any expense at all to the Government.

Mr. ASHURST. Let the amendment to the amendment which has been proposed by the Senator from Oregon be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 105 it is proposed to strike out from line 5 to line 18, inclusive, as follows:

On the first Monday in December, 1918, and annually thereafter, a detailed statement of expenditures, as heretofore described, for the preceding fiscal year shall be transmitted to Congress by the Secretary of the Interior.

The sum of $12,000 is hereby appropriated for expenses of installing the new system of bookkeeping and accounting required by this section, including the pay of expert accountants, at a rate of not exceeding $15 per day, and their assistants, to be employed by the Secretary of the Interior; transportation and sleeping-car fare of such employees when traveling under orders of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs; and the purchase of such books, stationery, and other supplies as may be necessary.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

That on or before the 31st day of December, 1916, the Bureau of Efficiency shall prepare and submit to the Secretary of the Interior a system of accounting for the Bureau of Indian Affairs that will meet the requirements of section 26 of the Indian appropriation act approved June 30, 1913, 38 Statutes at Large, page 103.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I do not quite understand the reference in the latter part of the proposed amendment. It refers to section 26 of the Indian appropriation act of 1913. Is not that section of that act superseded by the language of the amendment? It says:

That section 26 of the Indian appropriation act approved June 30, 1913 (38 Stat. L., p. 103), is hereby amended so as to read as follows.

The point is that the reference should be to this amendment, and not to the act of 1913, which is superseded.

Mr. LANE. That may be so.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is the only point of the suggestion.

Mr. LANE. I do not know as to that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It should say "in accordance with the foregoing," and not "in accordance with the act of June 30, 1913," which is superseded by this act.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I am in favor of this amendment, but I believe it should begin by striking out all after line 13, on page 104. Does that meet the views of the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not know; I am not familiar with the statute; but the point is that if you leave in the provision which precedes the amendment, then the reference should be to this provision and not to the act which is superseded.

Mr. ASHURST. That is true.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If you strike out the whole section and insert the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon, then the reference is correct.

Mr. LANE. Then I move to strike out the entire section. I am acquainted in a general way with the faults of the system. As I am reliably informed, the books have never been analyzed and no balance has ever been taken from them since the early foundation of the bureau. An expert was employed to check the books over, but he was unable to strike a balance. The department itself freely acknowledges that it can not do so and asks for the installation of a system which will allow their accounts to be handled in a proper and businesslike manner. I understand that there is a board or bureau provided by the Government for that purpose, and I do not see any reason why we shall expend $12,000 when it can be done without the cost of a penny. That is my object, and if it requires the striking out of the whole section to perfect my amendment, I will ask that that be done.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, upon what information does the Senator suggest to us that the recommendations of the Efficiency Commission will meet the necessities of the case?

Mr. LANE. All I know about it is that there is in operation a certain bureau of efficiency, and I am reliably informed by several Senators of whom I have made inquiry that it is competent to do the work. The department desires the task accomplished, and there is further evidence, as I said awhile ago, in the report of the special experts who failed to balance the books.

Mr. OWEN. I believe the Bureau of Efficiency was abolished, though as to that I am not certain.

Mr. LANE. I spoke to the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] a moment ago regarding the matter, and he assured me that the bureau was perfectly reliable and competent. Personally I do not know the members of it.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator from Oregon to the first part of section 27 as proposed, which requires the Secretary of the Interior to put into force before the 1st day of July, 1917, this system, and the second part of the proposal as made by him provides that the manner of the bookkeeping shall be prescribed by the Bureau of Efficiency or the board of efficiency experts, whoever they are. There are two different proposals entirely—one in relation to the form prescribed and the other that when it is prescribed it shall be put into effect. Does the Senator wish to leave the matter merely with the suggestion by the Efficiency Bureau as to form, without requiring it to be put into effect?

Mr. LANE. No. If the Bureau of Efficiency suggest a good plan, and it meets with the approval of Congress and the Secretary of the Interior, I think we ought to take measures to adopt it. The matter has been running along now for 80 years without any remedy, and this is merely a step in the right direction.

Mr. OWEN. I agree with the Senator that it should be done.

Mr. LANE. I know the Senator does. The Senator from Oklahoma referred to the matter before the Committee on Indian Affairs and made the same recommendation that I have made.

Mr. OWEN. I made such recommendation. I suggest that the amendment be agreed to, and then it can be adjusted in conference.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I understand we are now considering the amendment on page 103, to strike out section 26.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That has already been stricken out.

Mr. JONES. Has that amendment been agreed to?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been agreed to.

Mr. JONES. I am very sorry that that is the case. I did not realize that we had progressed that far. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee now as to why section 26 is stricken out? Why is it that we can not have an item in this bill that will require of the department a full and complete accounting of all moneys that it expends?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the Senate committee was of the opinion that the matter substituted, commencing on line 9, page 104, would provide a better, more efficient, and a more accurate method of accounting.

Mr. JONES. Then, section 27 is intended as a substitute for section 26.

Mr. ASHURST. That is the idea; section 27 is intended to be a substitute for the portion stricken out.

Mr. JONES. Let me ask the Senator, will section 27 require the Indian Office to keep and submit to Congress detailed statements of the moneys of the Indians which they expend for the benefit of the Indians, or does it only cover appropriations made by Congress?

Mr. LANE. I am informed, if the Senator will permit me, that section 27 will not accomplish that.

Mr. JONES. That is what I thought.

Mr. LANE. The provision in the amendment which I am offering as a substitute for this will allow that to be done.

Mr. JONES. The Senator is offering a substitute for the provision in the bill?

Mr. LANE. I am.

Mr. JONES. I am glad to know that, because I understand that the Indian Office always has been acting under authority given them possibly years and years ago. They have had to expend money for the benefit of the Indians, and have been spending thousands and thousands of dollars without rendering any accounting, and we can not get any accounting. That ought not to be permitted.

Mr. LANE. That, Mr. President, is my understanding. Not thousands, but hundreds upon hundreds of thousands have been expended without a report ever being made to Congress. We know nothing about it and can not secure the information.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, if the Senator from Washington believes that the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE] is not adequate and is insufficient to require the department to furnish the data he thinks should be furnished, and which I presume all think should be furnished, there is no objection whatever to so amending the provision that it will accomplish the object desired.

Mr. JONES. I will say that I could not think that the chairman of the committee would be opposed to the information being furnished.

Mr. ASHURST. Everybody is in favor of requiring the information to be furnished.

Mr. JONES. I do not know what the language of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon is. I should like to have it again stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add a new section to the bill, as follows:

SEC. 27. That on or before the 31st day of December, 1916, the Bureau of Efficiency shall prepare and submit to the Secretary of the Interior a system of accounting for the Bureau of Indian Affairs that will meet the requirements of section 26 of the Indian appropriation act approved June 30, 1913. (38 Stat. L., 103.)

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I do not know what the provisions of section 26 of the Indian appropriation act referred to are; I have not had time to look up that act; I do not know what that section requires; and I do not know whether or not the amendment meets the situation. I take it, however, that this matter can be adjusted pretty well in conference, and, in view of the opinion expressed here by the chairman of the committee, I have no doubt that there will be worked out in conference a reasonable, broad, comprehensive provision, and one that will take care of the situation. So I shall have nothing further to say regarding it.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I think I can present a solution of the difficulty, to which all Senators will agree. Let the Senate disagree to the amendment striking out section 26 and adopt the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon. That surely is so broad and so comprehensive that it is bound to include every possible fund concerning which accounting and reports should be made.

Mr. JONES. Does the Senator mean to disagree to the amendment striking out section 26?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes; disagree to the committee's amendment, which would restore section 26, and then add the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. JONES. That would be satisfactory to me.

Mr. ASHURST. Then, the most remote excursion of the imagination could not possibly find anything concerning which the bureau would not be called upon to make reports.

Mr. JONES. That would be satisfactory to me.

Mr. OWEN. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that if the Senate disagrees to the amendment striking out section 26, that section will stand in the bill and will not be in conference. It will be necessary to agree to the amendment striking that section out in order to put the subject matter into conference.

Mr. JONES. I would rather not have it in conference; I would rather have section 26 agreed to; but, in view of the fact that I am advised by the President of the Senate that the amendment striking out section 26 has already been agreed to, I desire to express the hope that the conference committee will work the matter out satisfactorily.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, one further word. Whatever form the amendment takes, I think we should make the appropriation of $12,000 to provide for sufficient clerks to carry out its provisions.

Mr. JONES. I am not opposing that at all.

Mr. ASHURST. I think that it will cost $12,000 a year for clerk hire to provide this information. I say that now, so that Senators may be advised.

Mr. JONES. We ought to have the information; we can not dispense with the provision for the accounting of the Indian funds merely because it may cost a little money. It probably will cost a little something, but I am not opposed to the appropriation at all. What I am anxious to have is the accounting.

Mr. ASHURST. I wish to assert that the accounting as provided for by section 26 will require at least $12,000 a year to provide the necessary experts and clerks.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Question!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now recurs on the amendment as amended.

Mr. JONES. As I understand, section 26 is stricken out, so that it will go to conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That provision will go to conference.

Mr. JONES. I really have no objection to that. The whole matter, then, will be worked out in conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment as amended is agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I desire to offer an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is it a committee amendment?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The committee amendments are not disposed of as yet, and they are to be disposed of first, under the order of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the first amendment passed over.

The SECRETARY. The first amendment passed over is on page 67, after line 18, to insert:

To pay the Women's Board of Domestic Missions, Reformed Church in America, $10,000 to reimburse said board for buildings on the Fort Sill Military Reserve, in the State of Oklahoma, constructed by said board with the consent of the Government and utilized for the education and civilization of the Fort Sill Apache prisoners of war until the removal of said Indians from said Fort Sill Military Reserve.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I dislike very much to make a point of order against this item, but it is clearly subject to a point of order, because it is a private claim, and it ought to be considered by the Committee on Claims. A similar item went out on a point of order on the floor of the House. It may be that this is a meritorious claim; and I will say, as one member of the Claims Committee, that if it is referred to that committee I shall give it very careful consideration. I do not think, however, it should go on this bill, and I therefore make the point of order that it is a private claim on a general appropriation bill.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the claim referred to is to reimburse the Women's Board of Domestic Missions of the Reformed Church in America the cost of the buildings which were erected for the instruction of these Indians, who were then moved away by the Government of the United States, leaving the buildings without any use to which they could be put by the Women's Board of Domestic Missions.

I think what the Senator says is true with regard to its being subject to a point of order, and I can not with good grace argue that it is not subject to a point of order, because I really think it is. I had hoped, however, that it might not meet that objection, because of the special merit of the case.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What rule of the Senate makes this item subject to a point of order?

Mr. OWEN. It is a claim against the United States on account of this action. I assumed, therefore, that it was subject to a point of order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma a question about this item. I seem to recollect that it has been up before. It seems to me that it was before the committee when I was a member of it.

Mr. OWEN. Yes; it was recommended, I believe, during the last Congress, but the Indian appropriation bill failed during the last Congress.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It was quite fully investigated by the Indian Affairs Committee at one time, as I recall.

Mr. OWEN. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And we were all of the opinion that it was a meritorious item.

Mr. OWEN. It is a meritorious item, and I had hoped no point of order would be made against it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The item has been pending for a great many years, has it not?

Mr. OWEN. Not a great many years; just three or four years. It could be sent to the Claims Committee, I suppose, if the point of order is insisted upon, and might be disposed of there.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the Chair see if he understands the point of order of the Senator from North Dakota. Is it that this is a claim?

Mr. GRONNA. That it is a claim on an appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Where is the rule that makes it subject to a point of order?

Mr. GRONNA. I think Rule XVI.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is not anything there about a claim.

Mr. GRONNA. I read paragraph 4:

No amendment, the object of which is to provide for a private claim, shall be received to any general appropriation bill, unless it be to carry out the provisions of an existing law or a treaty stipulation, which shall be cited on the face of the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is right. The point of order will be sustained.

Mr. GRONNA. Now, Mr. President, I ask that we recur to page 44.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, there was another amendment, a Wisconsin amendment, passed over. A point of order was made against it. I should like to have that matter determined.

Mr. GRONNA. Very well.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over is at the foot of page 68:

For continuing the relief and settlement of the Apache Indians formerly confined as prisoners of war at Fort Sill Military Reservation, Okla., on lands in Oklahoma to be selected for them by the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of War, $40,000; to be expended under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of War may prescribe, and to be immediately available and to remain available until expended.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I believe the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] asked to have that amendment go over. I do not see him in his seat at this moment.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator from Utah is in the Committee on Appropriations. He will be here very shortly.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask, then, that we recur to page 44.

On March 24 the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] offered an amendment to the bill striking out, beginning with line 21 on page 44, the remainder of that page, and also the matter on page 45 down to line 20, and inserting a provision which I did not clearly understand at the time. My objection to the proposed legislation was that it would permit the cutting and disposition of immature timber.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me a moment, he has misstated the page. The amendment to which he refers begins on line 17 on page 43, and continues to and inclusive of line 20 on page 47.

Mr. GRONNA. That is correct The Senator's amendment does protect the growing timber; but I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, which I will send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is not this an amendment to which the Chair sustained a point of order?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. CLAPP. Why, Mr. President, the Vice President will recall the fact that on my suggestion the point of order was reserved; and it is the desire of the Senator from North Dakota now to perfect the amendment before the point of order is disposed of. The Chair will recall, I think, that I asked the Chair to withhold the ruling on the point of order until another day.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair, beyond any doubt, said that the point of order would be sustained, and that there could be an appeal to the Senate. As the Chair understood, it was simply going over until the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] returned, in order that the appeal might be taken, and the Senate might settle the question.

Mr. CLAPP. That is true. At the same time, as long as the matter is pending, I can not see why the amendment might not be perfected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has not any objection to the amendment being perfected if it can be done under the state of the record. That is the only question—whether the state of the record is such that the amendment can be offered.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I understand that the matter is pending and has not been finally disposed of, and that with that amendment the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE], who made the point of order, is willing to withdraw the point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On what day was this amendment considered?

Mr. NELSON. The 24th of March.

Mr. CLAPP. Friday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the Chair see if he can find out the state of the record. [A pause.] The record seems to be in a condition about as follows: That the point of order was sustained, and that the Senator from Minnesota asked the Chair to withhold his ruling until to-morrow, after it was sustained. The Chair then said that he would withhold the ruling, but would decide it the same way upon to-morrow. That seems to be all there is of the record.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, what is the status of the matter at this time?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has given the status of the record, as nearly as he can. The Chair assumed that the sole question would be an appeal from the ruling of the Chair when the senior Senator from Minnesota returned.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I suggest, as a parliamentary adjustment of the matter, that the Senator from Minnesota might make his motion to amend the bill with the proposed amendment intended to be offered by the Senator from North Dakota, and then the matter would come up anew; and, if no point of order were made against it, it would go through without taking the time for debate.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, there can be no question——

Mr. NELSON. Will not the Senator from Oregon temporarily withdraw the point of order?

Mr. LANE. I have no objection to temporarily withdrawing my point of order against the amendment, reserving the right to renew it.

Mr. NELSON. If the point of order is withdrawn, then I suppose the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota would be in order.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I am informed by men who tell me that they have had communication with the Indians whose affairs are concerned in this proposition that the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], with the further amendment submitted by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], is satisfactory to them. That is all I was trying to accomplish. If it does that, I am willing to agree to it; and if it does not, then I want to raise another point of order against it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The difficulty seems to be that there is a point of order and there is not a point of order.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, to my mind the Chair was clearly right in sustaining the point of order. I will therefore offer as a new amendment the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota, with my amendment added to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is perfectly clear. The difficulty can be gotten around in that way, and the matter will then be before the Senate.

The SECRETARY. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota, on behalf of his colleague, is as follows:

Beginning in line 21, on page 44, it is proposed to amend the committee amendment by striking out down to the word "Provided," in line 20, on page 45, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

That lands within said Red Lake Indian forest which are not covered with standing and growing merchantable pine timber and which are suited for the production of agricultural crops and which are fronting upon a lake shore may be allotted to individual Red Lake Indians: Provided, That no such allotment shall exceed 80 acres nor have more than 80 rods fronting upon a lake shore: Provided further, That in case an Indian has improved and cultivated more than 80 acres, his allotment may embrace his improvements to the extent of 160 acres.

That said forest shall be administered by the Secretary of the Interior in accordance with the principles of scientific forestry, with a view to the production of successive timber crops thereon, and he is hereby authorized to sell and manufacture only such standing and growing pine and oak timber as is mature and has ceased to grow, and he is also authorized to sell and manufacture from time to time such other mature and marketable timber as he may deem advisable, and he is further authorized to construct and operate sawmills for the manufacture of the timber into merchantable products and to employ such persons as he shall find necessary to carry out the purposes of the foregoing provisions, including the establishment of nurseries and the purchase of seeds, seedlings, and transplants when needed for reforestation purposes.

At the end of that amendment the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] proposes to add:

Provided, That all timber sold under the provisions herein shall be sold on what is known as the bank scale.

Mr. ASHURST. There is no objection to that amendment.

Mr. LANE. I withdraw my point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, just a word right in that connection. In the case of the amendment on page 39, beginning with line 11, and running down to and including line 18, on page 40, the appropriation of $6,000 for the expenses of the tribal council, a point of order was submitted to the Senate, and the Senate sustained the point of order. At the time I entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which that point of order was sustained. I desire to have that question submitted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota to reconsider the vote whereby the Senate decided that the amendment beginning in line 11, page 39, and running to and including line 18, on page 40, was decided to be not germane to the Indian appropriation bill. [Putting the question.] The Chair is unable to decide.

Mr. CLAPP. I call for a division.

The VICE PRESIDENT. All in favor of reconsidering the vote whereby this amendment was decided to be not germane will rise. [A pause.] All those opposed will rise. [A pause.] The motion to reconsider is agreed to.

Now the question is again before the Senate as to whether this amendment is germane. [Putting the question.] The Chair refuses to decide the vote, there being one "aye" and one "no."

Mr. CLAPP. I call for a division.

The VICE PRESIDENT. All those who believe the amendment is germane will rise. [A pause.] Those who believe it is not germane will rise. [A pause.] The Senate decides that the amendment is germane.

The question now is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over is on page 97, the proviso beginning on line 18:

There is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated——

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, that has been read.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I simply want to say that when my attention was called to this matter a little while ago I stated that I was not familiar with it. The matter has been under the charge of the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. Since that time I have looked into the subject; and inasmuch as the point of order appears to be well taken, I do not see that any objection I can interpose will do any good.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I make the point of order on the amendment that it is a claim. It shows on its face that it is a claim.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The language of the rule is, "private claim."

Mr. SMOOT. This is a private claim.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, has the point of order been sustained?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not yet.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, it is a claim of individual Indians, and could not very well be anything but a private claim; and the last part of the amendment is clearly general legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is not sufficiently advised about the state of this claim to rule as to whether it is a private claim or not. What is the fact about it? Has the $125,000 been found due these Indians?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the Secretary of the Interior found so much money due a certain part of a tribe of Indians that had not been paid to them as annuities. This amendment is to authorize him to pay each of those individuals, and the latter part of it authorizes him to make a roll and to strike names from the roll of that band or part of the tribe that had claimed they were entitled to be enrolled, if he finds they are not entitled to enrollment.

It seems to me that the item is objectionable in two respects: First, that the first part of it is a claim, and, second, that the second part is general legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is going to sustain the point of order.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, there is an item passed over in regard to Oklahoma.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is it a further committee amendment?

Mr. ASHURST. A committee amendment, passed over. It was the item for continuing the relief and settlement of the Apache Indians formerly confined as prisoners of war at Fort Sill Military Reservation, Okla., on lands in Oklahoma to be selected for them by the Secretary of the Interior, and so forth.

Mr. PAGE. Will the Senator kindly give us the page?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes; I will. The amendment is found on page 68 of the bill. The senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] requested that this item be passed over; and I wish to read the following justification from page 302 of the House hearings:

The act of August 4, 1912 (37 Stats., 518–534), as supplemented by the act of June 30, 1913 (38 Stat. L., 77–94), appropriated $300,000 for the relief and settlement of the Fort Sill Apache Indians confined as prisoners of war at the Fort Sill Military Reservation. Of this amount, $120,000 was apportioned by the office to be used for the removal of those Fort Sill Apaches who elected to go to the Mescalero Reservation, about 183 in number, and $180,000 was set aside to be used for the purchase of lands in Oklahoma for those electing to remain there.

With the exception of approximately $9,000, this fund is exhausted, but the work of purchasing lands for the 82 members of the band who elected to remain in Oklahoma has not yet been completed, viz, there are yet 13 minor Indians unprovided for, who are entitled, under the regulations jointly adopted by this department and the War Department governing the procedure to be followed in these cases, to a $2,000 allotment each, making a total of $26,000, and three heads of families entitled to allotments worth $3,000 each, under the aforesaid regulations, making a grand total of $35,000 yet needed for the completion of the allotment work.

The aforesaid regulations provided, in accordance with an understanding theretofore had with the Indians, that rations should be furnished them during the first year of their stay on their new allotments. This part of the agreement was not carried out, owing to a misconception of the matter by the superintendent in charge, and it is now proposed to allow 80 Indians $12 per month per capita to reimburse them for rations purchased during the aforesaid period from their own funds. This will involve an outlay of $11,520. The cost of land, $35,000, plus the allowance in lieu of rations, $11,520, less the $9,000 balance on hand, shows a minimum amount yet required of $37,520. The difference between this amount and the sum asked for has been added to cover unforeseen expenses with a view to avoiding the necessity of asking for a further appropriation. If not required, it will be returned to the Treasury in the usual manner.

That is the explanation and justification. I think it should go into the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, before the amendment is agreed to I should like to offer an amendment to it, to strike out the words on page 69, line 3, "and to remain available until expended."

Mr. ASHURST. There is no objection to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the committee amendment on page 69, line 3, it is proposed to strike out the words "and to remain available until expended."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there any further committee amendments?

Mr GRONNA. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 22, it is proposed to amend the bill by changing the period after "$150,000" to a colon, and adding the following:

Provided, That the provisions of sections 2140 and 2141 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall also apply to beer and other intoxicating liquors named in the act of January 30, 1897 (29 Stat. L., p. 506).

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, section 2139 of the Revised Statutes of the United States was amended on July 23, 1892, so as to include therein the prohibition of the sale of beer and similar intoxicants to Indians. On January 30, 1897, this act was further amended so as to prohibit the sale of extracts, bitters, or any other article which produces intoxication to Indian wards of the Government. Section 2140 of the Revised Statutes provides method of enforcing the prohibition against the introduction of liquors into Indian country. By some oversight sections 2140 and 2141 were not changed at the same time that 2139 was. It is therefore proposed to perfect these two sections of the Revised Statutes by including in their provisions the prohibition against beer and other liquors so that the purpose of Congress in keeping liquor away from the Indians and out of the Indian country may be fully effective.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Where does the amendment come in?

Mr. GRONNA. On page 3, after the numerals "$150,000." It simply has reference to enforcing the prohibition law in the Indian country.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I have given this amendment some considerable attention. I have examined the statute. I see no objection to it. I think it would be a salutary provision. It simply provides that no intoxicating liquor, malt, vinous, or spirituous, shall be brought into the Indian country on an Indian reservation. I see no objection to the amendment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me ask the Senator from North Dakota why he put it in as a proviso? That would seem to make it a limitation upon the appropriation of $150,000. It is not in any manner connected with the appropriation. It does not affect the use of the money. It seems to me the Senator ought to offer it as an independent provision of the bill.

Mr. GRONNA. I agree with the Senator from Utah, and I ask unanimous consent to strike out the word "Provided" and let it be an independent provision.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, as to the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota, I am in entire accord with the desire of the Senator to have this fault in legislation corrected; but really an appropriation bill is not the proper place in which to carry legislation of this character. Does not the Senator feel that it would be easy to put through a separate bill amending the provision of law and have the legislation enacted in an orderly way?

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator from Montana that this affects only Indian lands. It is, of course, clearly legislation; the Senator is correct in that, and it would be subject to a point of order if it is made; but the amendment is offered only for the purpose of perfecting the law, making it possible for the Indian Office to enforce the prohibition law on Indian reservations. I hope there will be no objection to it.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator will understand I have no objection at all to the amendment, and it is not my purpose to raise a point of order, but it is rather unfortunate to have such provisions in the midst of an appropriation bill, where one searching the statutes would scarcely expect to find them, and where, in the indexing of the statutes, it would, in all reasonable probability, be overlooked. One would naturally go to the penal statutes, to the subject of crimes, to find a statute of this kind, and not look for it in an appropriation bill. I would not make the exception, except that I can not conceive that there would be any difficulty at all in putting through a bill intended to correct this defect in legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Where is it offered? The Secretary does not understand where it is offered.

Mr. GRONNA. Strike out the word "Provided" and insert it as a new section, as suggested by the Senator from Utah.

The VICE PRESIDENT. After the appropriation or before?

Mr. GRONNA. After the appropriation.

Mr. ASHURST. Let it be a new paragraph instead of a new section.

The SECRETARY. After line 22, page 3, insert:

The provisions of sections 2140 and 2141 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall also apply to beer and other intoxicating liquors named in the act of January 30, 1897 (29 Stat. L., p. 506).

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be agreed to without objection.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 101, after line 3, insert:

With the consent of the Indians of the Lac Court Oreilles Tribe, to be obtained in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may require, flowage rights on the unallotted tribal lands, and, with the consent of the allottee or of the heirs of any deceased allottee and under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, flowage rights on any allotted lands in the Lac Court Oreilles Reservation, in the State of Wisconsin, may be leased or granted for storage-reservoir purposes. The tribe, as a condition to giving its consent to the granting or leasing of flowage rights on tribal lands, and any allottee or the heirs of any deceased allottee, as a condition to giving his or their consent to the leasing or granting of flowage rights on their respective allotments, may determine, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, what consideration or rental shall be received for such flowage rights, and in what manner and for what purposes such consideration or rental shall be paid or expended; and the consideration or rental shall be paid or expended under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Michigan.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN. I offer the following amendment:

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 62, under the North Carolina items, after line 15, insert:

For building a bridge across the Ocona Lufty River at Cherokee, on Government Indian school reservation in Swain County, N. C., $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. I offer an amendment, to come in on page 92, after line 7.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 92, after line 7, insert:

For the third installment in payment of $635,000 for water supply for irrigation of 40 acres of each Indian allotment on the Yakima Indian Reservation irrigation system in the State of Washington, provided by the act of August 1, 1914 (38 Stat. L., p. 604), $100,000 to be covered into the reclamation fund.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. On behalf of my colleague [Mr. BRADY], who is absent on account of illness, I offer an amendment, which I ask to have read and adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 30, after line 12, insert:

That jurisdiction be, and is hereby, conferred upon the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render judgment upon the claims, of whatsoever nature, both legal and equitable, of the following-named citizens of Idaho: Mrs. James Heatley and children, Abe Anderson, David Anderson, Neils Anderson, Chris. Wittinrich, W. H. Chester, William Williams, Fred Larsen, James W. Chester, Grant E. Barney, Joseph Nelson, John Swank, Mrs. Mattie M. Clement, Peter Anderson, Fred A. Rogers, George E. Tolmie, George W. Strong, Ira H. Hogan, Mrs. Donald Tolmie, Francis M. Merrell, jr., Charles C. Dewitt, John Boyd, Mrs. Abe C. Anderson, Lewis S. Pond, and L. S. Marriott, as to the amount of damages sustained as the result of the overflow of the land occupied by them and injury done to their improvements thereon held under possessory rights in connection with the construction by the Federal Government of the reservoir to provide storage water for the irrigation of lands belonging to the Indians on the Fort Hall Reservation in Idaho.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I would like to have the attention of the Senate for a moment. Under the laws of Minnesota, State highway aid can only be applied where all the land that is affected by the highway is subjected to the matter of assessments and benefits. In the northern part of Minnesota the State is embarrassed in the laying out and perfection of the highway plans because some of the lands are Indian allotments.

I have prepared an amendment which was in the bill last year. It is very carefully safeguarded. No assessment becomes effective until it is approved by the Secretary of the Interior. It carries no appropriation either of public funds or Indian funds. It simply makes a charge against the land when the Secretary of the Interior, upon examination, feels that the benefit of the road warrants it. The absence of the legislation practically prevents the building of roads where a part of the highway plan involves running by Indian allotments. I wish very much the Senate would permit me to put this amendment on the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 47, after line 20, insert:

That whenever the board of county commissioners of any county in the State of Minnesota establish a State rural highway in accordance with the laws of said State, which highway directly benefits allotments of Indians not subject to taxation or special assessments, but which allotments would be assessed for such benefits under the laws of the said State were they not exempt by treaty, act of Congress, or other law, the said board of county commissioners may make a schedule of assessments against such benefited allottees, the amount of said assessments in each case being that prescribed by the laws of the said State for lands situated and benefited similar to the allotments of such allottees, and when so made file the same with the Secretary of the Interior. If, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior, the projected State rural highway is one that will be for the best interests of the Indian allotments affected, then he shall ascertain whether the assessments proposed against the said allottees are fair and just as compared with assessments against other lands similarly situated and benefited. If he shall find that said assessments are fair and just in the manner and to the extent aforesaid, he shall make an order that the said assessments are and shall be charged against the several allottees benefited and provide for notice thereof being served upon any allottee affected thereby. But the amount of any assessment or levy made or charged during the time said allotments are held in trust by the United States shall not be nor at any time become a lien on said allotments. The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and empowered to pay to the county treasurer of such county said assessments and parts thereof as they become due out of any funds belonging to the Indians owning said benefited allotments, and which funds are under the control of the United States or Secretary of the Interior, or out of any tribal funds under the control of the United States or Secretary of the Interior which are subject to be prorated among the members of the tribe to which the Indians owning such benefited allotments belong. Such sums as may be paid from tribal funds shall be charged against the Indians whose respective assessments have been paid: Provided, That every Indian who has been assessed in the manner aforesaid shall have the right to appeal within 30 days after being notified of such assessment to the Secretary of the Interior for a reexamination and readjudication of whether or not he has been assessed greater than his proportionate share, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to reduce the amount of such assessment if in his judgment justice requires it.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I have looked into the matter and this same provision was in the bill last year, agreed to by the Senate and the House, and it was agreed to by the conference. Personally I have no objection to it.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the proposal, I think, is entirely right and justified; I am in favor of it, but I should like to have it apply to Oklahoma. I should think every Senator would want it to apply to his own State, because it is a very necessary and proper provision.

Mr. CLAPP. I have no objection. I think it ought to apply undoubtedly wherever under the State laws it is necessary for the court to deal with the question.

Mr. OWEN. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words "the State of Minnesota" and inserting "in any State."

Mr. CLAPP. I have no objection whatever to the amendment to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out the words "the State of Minnesota" where it occurs in line 2 and insert the words "in any State."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. Now, Mr. President, I should like to say a word on this subject. In view of what we have been doing here for the last 30 minutes, I do not think anyone ought to offer any objection to any kind of legislation.

Mr. ASHURST. No one has done so.

Mr. PAGE. But it seems that as matters have gone on our friends here have taken more and more courage, until now they propose an amendment here that is in effect a proposition to cover the whole United States, and to do it on an appropriation bill.

To my mind this legislation is vicious. I do not want to interpose my views against the views of those who understand the matter better than I, but I do believe we had better hesitate about it before going further in the way of legislating on this appropriation bill. I do not want to see this amendment adopted. It ought not, in my judgment, to pass; and certainly it ought not to pass as an amendment to an appropriation bill.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I called the attention to the nature of this amendment. I hardly think the suggestion that amendments are being rushed is warranted. Everyone understood the character of this legislation.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I make the point of order that it is general legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. CLAPP. Now, in relation to the bill itself, I gather from the statement of one of the clerks that when the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] reintroduced the amendment which I offered on Friday the clerk did not recognize it as a reintroduction of the entire amendment which I offered on Friday. I know the Senator intended that his amendment should be added to the entire amendment. The entire amendment should be agreed to. Otherwise it leaves the legislation absolutely meaningless.

Mr. GRONNA. I agree with the Senator. That was my intention.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask that the record be made to conform with that statement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Minnesota tell the Secretary of the Senate where it begins and where it ends, as he desires to have it agreed to by the Senate?

Mr. CLAPP. The amendment was printed, and reads as follows:

On page 44, in line 12, to strike out the word "section" and insert in lieu thereof the word "paragraph."

Strike out all beginning with line 21, on page 44, down to the word "Provided," in line 20, page 45, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That lands within said Red Lake Indian forest which are not covered with standing and growing merchantable pine timber and which are suited for the production of agricultural crops and which are fronting upon a lake shore may be allotted to individual Red Lake Indians: Provided, That no such allotment shall exceed 80 acres nor have more than 80 rods fronting upon a lake shore: Provided further, That in case an Indian has improved and cultivated more than 80 acres, his allotment may embrace his improvements to the extent of 160 acres.

"That said forest shall be administered by the Secretary of the Interior in accordance with the principles of scientific forestry, with a view to the production of successive timber crops thereon, and he is hereby authorized to sell and manufacture only such standing and growing pine and oak timber as is mature and has ceased to grow, and he is also authorized to sell and manufacture from time to time such other mature and marketable timber as he may deem advisable, and he is further authorized to construct and operate sawmills for the manufacture of the timber into merchantable products and to employ such persons as he shall find necessary to carry out the purposes of the foregoing provisions, including the establishment of nurseries and the purchase of seeds, seedlings, and transplants when needed for reforestation purposes: Provided, That all timber sold under the provisions herein shall be sold on what is known as the bank scale."

Provided, That no contract shall be made for the establishment of any mill, or to carry on any logging or lumbering operations which shall constitute a charge upon the proceeds of the timber, until an estimate of the cost thereof shall have first been submitted to and approved by Congress.

That the Secretary of the Interior may issue permits or grant leases on such lands for camping or farming. No permit shall be issued for a longer term than one year and no lease shall be executed for a longer term than five years. Every permit or lease issued under authority of this act to Indians or to other persons or corporations, and every patent for an allotment within the limits of the forest created by section 1, shall reserve to the United States the right to cross the land covered thereby with logging roads or railroads, to use the shore line, or to erect thereon and use such structures as shall be necessary to the proper and economical management of the Indian Forest created by this act; and the Secretary of the Interior may reserve from allotment tracts considered necessary for such administration.

After the payment of all expenses connected with the administration of these lands as herein provided the net proceeds therefrom shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Red Lake Indians and draw interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum. The interest on this fund may be used by the Secretary of the Interior in such manner as he shall consider most advantageous and beneficial to the Red Lake Indians. Expenditure from the principal shall be made only after the approval by Congress of estimates submitted by the said Secretary.

That the Secretary of the Interior shall select and set apart an area not exceeding 200 acres, in sections 20, 21, 28, and 29, township 151 north, range 34 west, cause the lands thus selected to be surveyed and platted into suitable lots, streets, and alleys, and dedicate said streets and alleys and such lots and parcels as he may consider necessary to public uses. The lands thus selected shall not be allotted, but held as an Indian town site subject to further legislation by Congress.

That the timber on lands of the Red Lake Indian Reservation outside the boundaries of the forest created by section 1 may be sold under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, and the proceeds administered under the provisions of the general deficiency act of March 3, 1883 (22 Stat. L., 590), and the Indian appropriation act of March 2, 1887 (24 Stat. L., 463).

The VICE PRESIDENT. That was read and agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. But the trouble is the reading clerk, and I am not finding any fault with him, read only a portion of the amendment down to the point where the Senator from North Dakota had inserted his amendment. So it stands now as only being that part of the original Nelson amendment, and it leaves the record meaningless, while the Senator from North Dakota intended, of course, that the entire amendment should be incorporated.

Mr. OWEN. The trouble was that the Senator from North Dakota, in making his amendment, left no option about it. The clerk read simply what was sent up, and it is not the fault of the clerks at the desk at all.

Mr. CLAPP. I submit that the amendment which I have read and which I now send to the desk is the amendment offered on Friday, and I have no question that the Senator from North Dakota so understood.

Mr. GRONNA. I agree with what the Senator from Minnesota has said.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment as amended will be agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 94, after line 5, insert, as a new paragraph:

The Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to lease to citizens of the United States for mining purposes unallotted mineral lands on the diminished Spokane Reservation in the State of Washington for periods of 25 years, with privileges of renewal on such reasonable renewal conditions as may be determined by the Secretary of the Interior, and also with reasonable conditions to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior providing for the prosecution of mining development and operation. Such leases shall be made to applicants in the order in which applications shall be made. Free opportunity shall be given for prospecting of the said land, and rental shall be based upon mining production and shall be reasonable, and the proceeds of rental shall be paid into the Spokane Indian tribal fund.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Washington if this matter has ever been considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, let me answer that question. This provision was before the Committee on Indian Affairs last year, of which the distinguished Senator from Vermont was then as now a member. He took part in the discussion. It was agreed to by the Senate, it was agreed to by the House, and it was agreed to by the conference.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, that probably is true, but I do not recall back easily what I did 12 months ago.

It is a matter concerning which I now remember absolutely nothing. If there is any argument in favor of it, it has not been presented to me, and I do not quite understand why we are asked now to adopt legislation which has not been considered by any committee this year. It may have been before the committee last year or the year before. I do not know why the Senator from Washington did not permit us to consider it in committee and pass upon it this year. I should like an explanation.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, it might have been proper to have presented the amendment again. It undoubtedly would have been, but in view of the fact that it has not only been considered by the committee but was debated at considerable length in the Senate and adopted by the Senate I thought it would be proper to offer it here now.

The amendment relates to a single Indian reservation in which the agricultural lands have been opened for agricultural entry and have been taken up as homesteads. Certain parts of the land were reserved as timberland and are still in the reservation, which is now called a diminished Indian reservation. There are supposed to be certain minerals there. They do no one any good, Indians or whites, so long as they are not developed. I fail to see any tangible ground of opposition to some method by which these mineral lands may be opened.

I would have preferred myself that the lands be opened up under the mineral laws of the United States with some sort of a royalty based upon mining profit to be paid into the Indian fund, but rather than not have them opened at all I have offered this amendment, which is in accordance with the policy of the administration in regard to reserved Indian lands, and with legislation which they say they expect to present to Congress, but which they have not presented. It is in order to get some action and to unlock the doors which have shut progress from this reservation that I have offered the amendment in this form.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Washington has said sufficient to enlighten the Senate upon one point, at least, and that is that this is a proposition of such importance that it ought not to come before us and be acted upon in an appropriation bill. Is there in the mind of the Senator from Washington the slightest doubt about this being legislation?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Certainly it is not general legislation, Mr. President. It is special legislation applicable to a particular reservation.

Mr. PAGE. But is it germane to an appropriation bill?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is not germane; but it is not open to the objection of being general legislation.

Mr. PAGE. It would seem to me clearly so; but I yield to the Senator's better judgment of these matters. It seems to me that it is clearly open to a point of order.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I hope the Senator will not make the point of order.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I will not make the point of order. I will simply object to its adoption.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND. On page 32, after line 3, I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 32, after line 3, insert:

For reimbursement of Joseph Bradley, a member of the Saginaw Swan Creek and Black River Band of Chippewa Indians, in the State of Michigan, for traveling and incidental expenses incurred by him as an authorized representative of said band while appearing before Congress and the Interior Department in January, February, and March, 1916, $250, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be immediately available.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I do not raise the point of order, because that seems to be an improper thing to do here to-day; but I do not think the amendment is germane to this bill or that it ought to be adopted.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If the Senator from Vermont desires me to say a word about it, I will explain how the amendment happened to be offered here and was not presented before the committee.

Mr. PAGE. I will withdraw any suggestion on my part as to making a point of order. I simply say that we are loading down this bill with private claims, and yet, in offering the amendment, I do not think the Senator is doing otherwise than following the common custom.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ASHURST. I propose the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in under the head of "Utah."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Arizona will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert, under the head of "Utah," the following amendment:

That the lands and also all the mineral therein, within the former Uncompahgre Indian Reservation, in the State of Utah, which were specifically reserved for future action of Congress, in the act approved March 3, 1903 (32 Stat., p. 998), and the remainder of the lands within even-numbered sections, in said reservation, reserved in the act approved June 7, 1897 (30 Stat., p. 87), as containing gilsonite, asphaltum, elaterite, or other like substances, and which were, by said act of March 3, 1903, authorized to be sold and disposed of in tracts not exceeding 40 acres, shall, unless otherwise reserved, be immediately open to settlement, location, occupation, and entry under all the land laws of the United States according to the character of the lands or of the mineral deposits therein.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say that that amendment as a bill passed the Senate on March 9, 1916, and there is a favorable report from the department on it.

Mr. ASHURST. I ask unanimous consent to include in the RECORD the report of the department on this subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, permission to do so will be granted.

The report referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 7, 1915.

Hon. HENRY L. MYERS,
Chairman Committee on Public Lands, United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am in receipt of your request for report upon S. 6623, Sixty-third Congress, second session, providing that lands and the minerals therein within the former Uncompahgre Indian Reservation, in the State of Utah, reserved for future action of Congress by the acts of March 3, 1903 (32 Stat., 998), and June 7, 1897 (30 Stat., 87), as containing gilsonite, asphaltum, elaterite, or other like substances, shall, unless otherwise reserved, be immediately opened to settlement, location, occupation, and entry under all the land laws of the United States.

The act of June 7, 1897, supra, opened to location and entry under the land laws of the United States the unallotted lands in the former Uncompahgre Indian Reservation, except lands containing the substances named, the title to the latter being reserved to the United States.

The act of March 3, 1903, supra, validated certain locations made upon the lands in question under the mining laws, provided that the even-numbered sections containing the minerals named might be disposed of by the President in tracts not exceeding 40 acres each, and that the balance of the lands and all the mineral therein should be specifically reserved for future action of Congress. This reservation, it will be noticed, was of the odd-numbered sections within said former reservation.

The act of June 21, 1906 (34 Stat., 376), validated and confirmed, as against the United States, certain patents issued upon said lands prior to March 3, 1903, upon locations made prior to January 1, 1891.

The Director of the Geological Survey reports that, in so far as he is advised, no elaterite, ozocerite, or sand asphaltum has been produced in commercial quantities from these lands, but there are in existence therein extensive and valuable veins of gilsonite, estimating that there are situated upon the even-numbered sections within said reservation upon unpatented lands 20 miles of veins and upon the odd-numbered sections 30.2 miles of veins.

Letters have been written to this department by some residents of the State of Utah, urging the opening of these minerals to disposition under the general mining laws, on the ground that this would open to location and entry by the general public considerable areas of land containing the minerals described, and promote a healthy competition with the owners of the deposits, the title to which has heretofore passed from the United States.

Upon careful consideration of the entire matter, I am of the opinion that the lands in question should be opened to disposition under the public-land laws. It is presumably the intent of the bill that lands containing valuable deposits of gilsonite or other minerals shall be subject to location, entry, and patent under the general mining laws of the United States, and the nonmineral lands, if any, be subject to disposition under appropriate nonmineral laws. In this connection, attention is directed to the act of July 17, 1914 (Public, No. 128), "An act to provide for agricultural entry of lands withdrawn, classified, or reported as containing phosphate, nitrate, potash, oil, gas, or asphaltic minerals."

In order to make it entirely clear that the lands in question, if mineral, shall be opened only to location and disposition under the mining laws, and if nonmineral, only under the nonmineral land laws of the United States, it might be well to amend line 7, page 2, to read: "Entry under all the land laws of the United States according to the character of the lands or of the mineral deposits therein."

Cordially, yours,

FRANKLIN K. LANE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in on page 93, after line 5.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 93, after line 5, it is proposed to insert the following:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized to sell and dispose of any portion of the lands included within the limits of the abandoned Fort Spokane Military Reservation, State of Washington, not necessary for hospital purposes, as provided for in the act approved August 1, 1914 (38 Stat. L., p. 584), at not less than the appraised value thereof, and to use the proceeds thereof in the establishment and maintenance of such new schools and administration of affairs as may be required by the Colville and Spokane Indians in said State.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Washington whether or not the War Department has approved of this suggested amendment?

Mr. JONES. The reservation therein referred to has been abandoned as a military reservation, and the Indian Office has sent a letter approving the amendment. I ask that the letter may be printed in the RECORD in connection with the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, March 24, 1916.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your letter of March 15, 1916, inclosing for report copy of an amendment intended to be proposed to H. R. 10385, authorizing the sale of the land in the abandoned Fort Spokane Military Reservation, Wash.

The proposed amendment authorizes the sale and disposition of any portion of the lands included within said military reservation not necessary for hospital purposes at not less than the appraised value thereof.

The lands in question are no longer needed for Indian school purposes, and inasmuch as such lands as may be necessary for hospital purposes are expressly excepted from the operation of the proposed amendment, I see no objection to the enactment of the proposed amendment into law, provided that it be modified so as to make the proceeds available for use in the establishment and maintenance of such new schools and administration of affairs as may be required by the Colville and Spokane Indians. I suggest that this be accomplished by adding the following after the word "thereof," in line 8 of the proposed amendment:

"And to use the proceeds thereof in the establishment and maintenance of such new schools and administration of affairs as may be required by the Colville and Spokane Indians in said State."

There is inclosed a redraft of the proposed amendment, with the modification above suggested incorporated therein, and as modified I recommend that the proposed amendment be enacted into law.

Cordially, yours,

ANDRIEUS A. JONES,
Acting Secretary.

Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST,
Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs,
United States Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, on yesterday, I think it was, I offered an amendment to strike out, on page 5, in lines 8 and 9, the words "to be immediately available," referring to the Choctaw and Chickasaw hospital in Oklahoma, $20,000. In a letter from the Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs the urgent necessity of this appropriation being made immediately available is set out in full. I entirely agree with the statement of the assistant commissioner, and I now ask that the vote by which the amendment offered by me striking out those words was agreed to may be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the committee was disagreed to, was it not?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the vote whereby the committee amendment was disagreed to is reconsidered, and that amendment is now agreed to. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the North Dakota items, on page 66, it is proposed to insert:

That all claims of whatsoever nature which the Sisseton and Wahpeton Bands of Sioux Indians may have or claim to have against the United States shall be submitted to the Court of Claims, with the right to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States by either party, for the amount due or claimed to be due said bands from the United States under any treaties or laws of Congress; and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Court of Claims to hear and determine all claims of said bands against the United States and also any legal or equitable defense, set-off, or counterclaim which the United States may have against said Sisseton and Wahpeton Bands of Sioux Indians, and to enter judgment, and in determining the amount to be entered herein the court shall deduct from any sums found due said Sisseton and Wahpeton Bands of Sioux Indians any and all gratuities paid said bands or individual members thereof subsequent to March 3, 1863: Provided, That in determining the amount to be entered herein, the value of the land involved shall not exceed the value of such land on March 3, 1863. If any such question is submitted to said court it shall settle the rights, both legal and equitable, of said bands of Indians and the United States, notwithstanding lapse of time or statute of limitations. Such action in the Court of Claims shall be presented by a single petition, to be filed within one year after the passage of this act, making the United States a party defendant which shall set forth all the facts on which the said bands of Indians base their claims for recovery; and the said petition may be verified by the agent or authorized attorney or attorneys of said bands, to be selected by said bands and employed under contract approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior, in accordance with the provisions of existing law, upon information or belief as to the existence of such facts, and no other statements or verifications shall be necessary. Official letters, papers, reports, and public records, or certified copies thereof, may be used as evidence. Whatever moneys may be found due the Sisseton and Wahpeton Bands of Indians under the provisions of this act, less attorney's fees, shall be placed to their credit in the Treasury of the United States: Provided, That the compensation to be paid the attorney or attorneys for the claimant Indians shall be determined by the Secretary of the Interior, but in any event shall not be greater than the amount named in the approved contract: Provided further, That such compensation shall in no event exceed $15,000.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate, but wish simply to say that this legislation was in the Indian appropriation bill of last year but went out in conference. It also passed the Senate last year as a separate bill, and has likewise passed the Senate this year. This legislation has been recommended by the Secretary of the Interior. It simply proposes to carry out treaty stipulations with these bands of Sioux Indians.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I have no objection to the amendment, but I hope Senators will not hold me to a strict account should our conferees find themselves unable to retain the amendment in conference. I must say that this is the just and proper place for such legislation; but I fear that we may not be able to get all the conferees to agree on it. Let the amendment go into conference, however, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to. The Chair hears none.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, on page 3 of the bill there is a provision "for the suppression of the traffic in intoxicating liquors among Indians," for which there is appropriated $150,000. That expenditure is made comparatively ineffective by the requirement under the law of proving that a person found in possession of intoxicating liquors has violated the law relating to introducing liquors across the State line. I now propose an amendment that the possession by a person of any intoxicating liquors in the country where the introduction is prohibited, shall be prima facie evidence of unlawful introduction. This legislation is desired by the administrative officers in Oklahoma, especially where we have great difficulty with that feature.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, after line 22, after the amendment already agreed to at that point, it is proposed to insert:

The possession by a person of intoxicating liquors in the country where the introduction is prohibited shall be prima facie evidence of unlawful introduction.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have an amendment here that is recommended by the department, and it has also been favorably reported by the Committee of the House of Representatives on Indian Affairs. It relates to a matter that I have observed considerably with reference to Indian reservations in my State, and I think it is very important that it should be adopted. On page 14, after line 6, I submit the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 14, after line 6, it is proposed to insert the following:

That whenever it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior that the allotted lands of any Indian are arid, but susceptible of irrigation, and that the allottee by reason of old age or other disability can not personally occupy or improve his allotment or any portion thereof, such lands, or such portions thereof, may be leased for a period not exceeding 10 years, under such terms, rules, and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, if no other Senator has an amendment to offer, I wish, in candor and frankness, to propose an amendment which the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs refused to report favorably and refused to authorize me to include in the bill. I feel, however, that as an individual Senator it is incumbent upon me to move the amendment at this time. In the committee I proposed an amendment appropriating $10,000 for the purpose of making an investigation as to the necessity, feasibility, or practicability of opening for sale and settlement the unallotted lands of the Colorado River Indian Reservation. First, I ask that my proposed amendment be read, again stating that members of the committee will recall that the amendment, I think, received but one vote in the committee, and that was my vote, but I wish now to propose the amendment on my own individual responsibility.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to expend not exceeding $10,000 from the proceeds from the sale of town lots on the Colorado River Reservation, arising under the act of April 30, 1908 (35 Stat. L., p. 77), for the examination and final location surveys of a dam site on the Colorado River, and the investigation and survey of an irrigation system to supply the land of the Colorado River Reservation from said dam, and for the design, preparation of maps, plans, and detailed specifications for said works, and estimate of cost thereof, for the utilization of the reserved rights to water from the Colorado River in the State of Arizona for the irrigation of approximately 150,000 acres of land on said reservation.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I shall be very brief. In 1908 an act of Congress was passed setting apart some 900 or 1,000 acres for the town site of Parker, Ariz. The town site was surveyed and the then honorable Secretary of the Interior in 1910 or thereabout paid a visit to that part of the country and delivered an interesting speech, describing to the assembled persons the fertility of the soil and stating that it would be a very good investment for American citizens if they would purchase some of the town lots, because the reservation would inevitably be opened. Accordingly citizens of my State—excellent and worthy citizens—purchased lots and paid for them at an appraised value. The Government was dissatisfied with the appraised value and cause another appraisement to be made, whereupon the price of the lots was elevated some 500 per cent. The citizens then paid the same; but I have been unable, the Member of the House from Arizona has been unable, and my distinguished colleague [Mr. SMITH] has been unable to induce the department to do anything further; and here, in the center of a desert, are these worthy citizens who went there, and who were attracted there partly because of the implied, if not expressed, promise of the Government to open the unallotted lands to entry.

Mr. President, under those sales there was taken from citizens of the United States, mostly citizens of Arizona, the sum of $62,103. There has been used of that fund $7,089, leaving in the Treasury as the avails of the sale of those lands the sum of $55,012.

Mr. President, I wish to have the Secretary read at the desk a short extract from the Parker Post, a paper published at Parker, Ariz., describing the situation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection the Secretary will read, as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is now a little over five years ago since Uncle Sam's real estate agents slipped into Parker and sold about $100,000 worth of sandy desert lots to the people of this community, and other investors, who relied upon the implied promises of the Government that the surplus lands of the Colorado River Indian Reservation would be open to settlement and entry within a reasonable time.

At the time of the auction sale of lots in the Parker town site a horde of deputy United States marshals accompanied the receiver of the Phoenix Land Office for the purpose of guarding the treasure chest which Uncle Sam accumulated here through the enterprise of his real estate sharks. Before the week ended our good uncle cleaned us up a la Wallingford, the guardians of the money chest departed, and not a peep has been heard from his fly-by-night agents since.

Any cheap real estate grafter who had gotten away with one one-hundredth part of the amount which Uncle Sam filched from the Parker people would now be serving a term in the penitentiary. Yet, in view of the rotten deal we have had from our Government, our Senators and Congressman have been powerless to do anything toward making the Government fulfill its promises or make restitution to the investors in town lots, which are absolutely worthless until such time as the surplus lands of the reservation are opened to settlement.

During the reading by the Secretary,

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I prefer to have the article read in its entirety; I do not want the article divided and "chopped up." It is interesting and pertinent.

Mr. GRONNA. Does not the Senator think it is a reflection upon the officials of the Government?

Mr. ASHURST. I state truth and state facts; all that I do is to state facts; I do not pay any attention to results if I am stating facts.

After the reading of the article was concluded,

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I present a memorial, which was unanimously adopted by the Legislature of Arizona, asking that the unallotted lands of this reservation be opened. I ask unanimous consent to include that memorial of the Legislature of Arizona in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the matter referred to will be printed in the RECORD.

The memorial referred to is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the Second Legislature of the State of Arizona, in regular session convened, respectfully represent:

That during the years of 1908 and 1909 the then Indian agent of the Colorado River Indian Reservation, under authority of the Department of the Interior, granted numerous permits to persons to settle upon certain lots in the Parker town site, Yuma County, Ariz.

That an appraisement was made of the lots of said town site under the direction of the Department of the Interior during the year 1909, and the persons occupying lots under permits granted by the department were given a preference right to purchase said lots.

That about 90 days thereafter a second appraisement of all lots in the Parker town site, including those occupied by permittees, was ordered by the Department of the Interior, and the valution was raised from 300 to 600 per cent above the figures set forth in the first appraisement. That this raise in appraised values was made because of the fact that the town site of Parker is within a short distance of the allotted Indian land on the Colorado River Indian Reservation, the surplus area of which was planned by the Department of the Interior to be opened to purchase and settlement at an early date.

That the said permittees occupying lots upon the Parker town site have paid to the United States under the valuations of town lots under the second appraisement the sum of $24,562.

That on May 10, 1910, the authorities of the United States held an auction sale of lots within the Parker town site and $56,698 worth of said lots were sold to residents of Parker and other investors. That $37,623 have been paid to the United States for lots purchased at said auction sale and there is still owing to the United States upon said sales the sum of $19,075.

That immediately prior to the auction sale of town-site lots at Parker Congress passed an act as follows:

"For the construction of a pumping plant to be used for irrigation purposes on the Colorado River Reservation, together with the necessary canals and laterals, for the utilization of water in connection therewith, for the purpose of securing an appropriation of water for the irrigation of approximately 150,000 acres of land, $50,000, to be reimbursed from the sale of the surplus lands of the reservation."

That the above act was, in effect, a representation by the United States that the surplus land of the Colorado River Indian Reservation was soon to be opened to settlement and entry by bona fide settlers. That the lots put up for sale at said auction had a prospective value only upon the assumption that said surplus lands would be opened to settlement at an early date. That the enormous increase in the valuation of lots in the Parker town site by the second appraisement above referred to was only justified by the carrying out of the implied promise contained in the above act that the surplus lands of the Colorado River Indian Reservation would be open to settlement.

That the town site of Parker is a barren desert, on land having an intrinsic value of less than $1 an acre. That whatever added value it may have arises from the fact that it is adjacent to the bottom lands of the Colorado River Indian Reservation, in which the surplus lands above referred to lie; and unless said lands are opened to settlement and entry the town site of Parker is worth little, or not more than any other desert land.

That the residents of Parker and numerous other residents of the State of Arizona interested therein, who were induced to purchase lots in the Parker town site by reason of the implied promise of the United States above set forth to open the reservation lands to entry, have repeatedly petitioned Congress and the Department of the Interior for the opening of said surplus lands.

That said purchasers of lots in Parker have further evidenced their reliance upon said implied promise of the United States to open said lands by investing large sums of money in buildings and improvements in said town of Parker, all of which will be worthless unless the said lands are opened to settlement.

That the allotments of land to the Indians belonging on said reservation have been approved by the Department of the Interior and the surplus land, amounting to approximately 125,000 acres, which might be open to entry, is segregated.

That, to the best knowledge and belief of your memorialists, there exists a sufficient flow of underground water for the irrigation and reclamation of the surplus lands.

That the surplus Indian lands above described are highly desirable as prospective farms, and hundreds of energetic and enterprising citizens of this State alone are awaiting the opportunity to secure tracts of lands for the purpose of making their homes thereon. That to the best knowledge and belief of your memorialists a large amount of the delay in opening the surplus lands of said reservation to settlement in accordance with the said implied promise of the United States has been caused by unnecessary entanglements of official red tape in the various bureaus at Washington having charge of reclamation work and Indian affairs.

That another reason which has been assigned for the delay in opening said lands for settlement is the fact that people having large cattle interests have leased certain of the lands involved and have been exerting their influence to delay the opening of said lands for settlement: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the Legislature of the State of Arizona, That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby, urged to enact any legislation which may be necessary for the opening for settlement of said lands, to the end that the implied promise of the United States, made to the settlers and purchasers of lots within the Parker town site, to the effect that Indian lands within the Indian reservation would be opened for settlement, be carried out.

Resolved further, That a copy of this memorial and these resolutions be forwarded to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Secretary of the Interior, and to the Representatives of Arizona in Congress, and that our Representatives in Congress be, and they are hereby, requested to do all in their power to accomplish the enactment of such legislation.

Passed the senate March 6, 1915, by a vote of 17 ayes; 2 absent.

W. P. SIMS, President.
OSCAR COLE, Secretary.
By C. P. CRONIN,
Assistant Secretary.

Passed the house March 4, 1915, by a vote of 28 ayes; 7 absent.

WM. E. BROOKS,
Speaker of the House.

Mr. ASHURST. Now I formally offer the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment has been read.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the chairman of the committee is correct in stating that the committee was opposed to this amendment. As it is not estimated for by any department and is not reported from any standing committee, I make the point of order against it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the Indian appropriation bill has so often been made a vehicle for legislation that I should like to present an amendment, to come in on page 10, line 20, which I regard as of some importance. Recently at the town of Tulsa, Okla., two United States deputy marshals were shot down in cold blood by a man engaged in the liquor traffic there. These marshals were sent to search the premises. This man shot them through a door and killed them both. The community was very much affected by a controversy between the liquor people and those who were opposing them, and the result was that the man who killed the deputy marshals was discharged. The Government attorney very violently protested against the action, and attributed it to the manner in which justice was attempted to be administered in that particular instance. I think the United States ought to protect its own servants and ought not to allow them to be killed without the criminals being subject to the laws of the United States. The proviso which I wish to offer, and which should follow immediately after the appropriation of $200,000 for the Indian police, reads:

Provided, That any person or persons committing murder, manslaughter, or assault with intent to kill on an Indian policeman or on any United States marshal or deputy marshal while in the discharge of his duties shall be subject to penalties provided by the laws of the United States relating to such crimes, and shall be tried by the district court of the United States exercising jurisdiction within the district where such crime was committed.

Of course, the amendment is subject to a point of order, if any Senator wishes to make it; but it seems to me that the Government ought to protect its own servants. If the language of the amendment be not altogether apt, it can, I take it, be adjusted in conference, if it meets with the general approval of the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether the State courts are not open and equipped with machinery for the administration of justice and for the punishment of such offenses?

Mr. OWEN. I stated—perhaps the Senator was not in—what occurred in the State court in Oklahoma.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; I heard the last statement of the Senator. Of course, justice sometimes miscarries, but it seems to me, Mr. President, that it is rather dangerous, to put it mildly, by such a sweeping amendment, to clothe the Federal courts with jurisdiction of crimes committed in the States. While it may be within our power to enact such legislation, nevertheless it might privilege the officers of the United States and extend the jurisdiction of the Federal courts over crimes which, under the guise of having been committed against men in the discharge of official duty, were really the outgrowth of those ordinary relations with which Federal judicial authority has nothing to do.

I appreciate the reason upon which this proposed amendment is based, and, while it doubtless is justified in the particular case, it seems to me that the remedy which is suggested by an isolated transaction, so to speak, might be utilized to deprive the State courts of a great deal of their necessary jurisdiction. I do not want to make the point of order against the Senator's amendment, but I do not think that we should enact such legislation without giving very serious consideration as to the consequences which may follow from its enactment.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I call attention to the fact that the amendment only applies to the Indian police and deputy marshals, who are charged with certain duties. They are sent to arrest men for violating the laws of the United States, and they ought not to be shot down in a community which is hostile to them and have juries packed in favor of those who shoot them and have justice so administered that they can not secure protection for their lives. The proper administration of the laws of the United States is impeded if the officers do not have adequate protection.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator whether or not the circumstances which he has detailed are not also sought to be covered by a bill which the Senator now has pending before the Senate Judiciary Committee, on which a subcommittee is now working, and concerning which the subcommittee has asked the views of the Department of Justice? Does not that bill cover the same class of cases referred to in the amendment?

Mr. OWEN. The amendment covers the same subject matter, but is, of course, a very condensed form of that bill.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes; but it is the same condition that the Senator seeks to reach.

Mr. OWEN. The same condition, yes; but the necessity for the amendment arises from the difficulty of getting bills through Congress. It is so difficult to get a bill passed which has to go through the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, then pass the Senate, then have to go through the Judiciary Committee of the House, and then pass the House, that I did not think it would be at all likely that we would get any action during the present Congress.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It is very unfortunate that the local authorities can not properly attend to such matters.

Mr. OWEN. I think they do in nine hundred cases out of a thousand.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I want to assure the Senator that the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee, to which the Senator's bill was referred, has not been quiescent, but has been at work upon it. I think I may safely say that the subcommittee has substantially agreed upon a portion of the Senator's bill, and has referred the matter to the Department of Justice for its consideration and its views upon the particular matters in the bill. In that view would it not suggest itself to the Senator that the provision—because it involves a matter of a great deal of importance—should take the regular course, instead of being put upon a bill where it can not be subject to discussion?

Mr. OWEN. I thought that the action which might be taken by the Judiciary Committee would be a proper basis for the substitution in the conference report of some other provision for this particular item—which, of course, is very brief—if it meets with the approval of the House of Representatives. I was aware that the committee had the matter under consideration, and I assumed that they would draft a measure that would cover this exigency. But the difficulty of getting such bills through is so great that the matter goes along from year to year. It has been now 20 years since the chief of Indian police, under my charge as United States Indian agent for the Five Tribes, was murdered in cold blood on Christmas eve on the streets of Muskogee, and without any remedy in the world. The Government gave him no protection. He took his life in his hands in dealing with Indian citizens there and exciting their animosity, and he was shot down, as I have said, in cold blood on the streets of Muskogee. It does not promote the administration of justice that the United States fails to protect its servants when those servants are sent to discharge a public duty.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, of course the proposed amendment would not affect that case. I imagine the Senator will agree to that statement.

Mr. OWEN. I did not hear exactly what the Senator said.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I say, of course, if the amendment suggested by the Senator from Oklahoma were adopted, it could not affect the case to which the Senator has referred.

Mr. OWEN. No; that was covered shortly afterwards by a statute which made the crime subject to the courts of the United States, where an Indian policeman was killed by an Indian.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But the case that has already happened can not be subjected to this law, because then it would be an ex post facto law.

Mr. OWEN. That only related to cases where they were killed by Indians. In the case of Sam Six Killer, who was chief of the Indian police and was killed by Indian citizens, the United States had no jurisdiction; but Congress did after that, upon my request, pass an act giving jurisdiction to the United States courts in such cases.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Oklahoma covers a pretty broad field. It applies not only to officials of the Indian Service, but it applies to deputy United States marshals and other officers of the Federal Government.

Mr. OWEN. In the discharge of their duty. I thought it covered a rather narrow field, because it only deals with the men who serve writs against those who belong to the criminal class.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But the amendment is much broader than the subject matter of the bill to which it is to be attached. It covers the whole field.

Mr. OWEN. Yes; I agree with the Senator in that respect. That is true.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I dislike very much to make a point of order against the amendment, and yet I think it is a subject that ought to be given very careful consideration.

Mr. OWEN. Then I ask that it be confined to the Indian police.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Even then, it opens up a very broad field, at any rate as a precedent. I wish the Senator would not offer it to this bill. I think it is a matter that ought to be considered fully by the Judiciary Committee. It is now receiving consideration at the hands of that committee, and I am quite sure it will be reported out in some form. I do not know just what form it will assume.

Mr. OWEN. If anything relating to the matter which would make it a subject of conference were to be put on the bill, then the views of the Judiciary Committee could, I take it, prevail by having them presented. That is what I hoped to accomplish. I thought that by putting this within the range of the conference report the Judiciary Committee might make suggestions that would cover it precisely according to what they might find necessary under the present statute.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah permit me to make an observation?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I am in entire accord with the Senator from Oklahoma in his desire to have this legislation enacted, and I am quite satisfied that under the decision In re Nagel there is no doubt about the jurisdiction of Congress to provide for the punishment of these crimes of violence committed against an officer of the United States in the discharge of the duties of his office. We now have a statute which relates to obstructions in the enforcement of process and crimes committed; but the penalty is of a trifling character, and it makes it only a misdemeanor.

The bill referred to was referred to a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, and a letter on the subject was received from the Attorney General. He suggests a general act applicable to the case, a draft of which had been prepared. It presents a rather important question of the strict bounds and lines of the jurisdiction as between the Federal Government and the State government in respect to the jurisdiction of Congress, and I express the hope, also, that the measure will be allowed to take its usual course. I feel very certain that the matter can be reported to the Judiciary Committee at its next meeting, and I feel quite satisfied that a speedy report will come from that committee. I feel very sure that there will be no opposition whatever to the spirit of the bill. It is a mere matter as to the details and the form it shall take.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, if the Senators feel that this amendment ought not to go on the bill, after what I have stated, I shall not insist upon it, but will very cheerfully withdraw the proposed amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is withdrawn.

The bill is still in the Senate and open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is, Shall the amendments be engrossed and the bill be read a third time?

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 13768) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the Military Establishment for the fiscal year 1916, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13043) making appropriations to supply further additional urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1916 and prior fiscal years.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 13768. An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the Military Establishment for the fiscal year 1916 was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. From the Committee on Appropriations, I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 13768) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the Military Establishment for the fiscal year 1916, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums are appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the Military Establishment for the fiscal year 1916, namely:

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF SIGNAL OFFICER.

Signal Service of the Army: For expenses of the Signal Service of the Army, including the same objects specified under this head in the Army appropriation act for the fiscal year 1916, and for radio installations, motor cycles, and motor-driven vehicles used for technical purposes, $600,000, to remain available during the fiscal year 1917: Provided, however, That not more than $500,000 of the foregoing appropriation shall be used for the purchase, maintenance, operation, and repair of airships and other aerial machines and accessories in the Aviation Section; and for the purchase, maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles which may be necessary for the Aviation Section.

QUARTERMASTER CORPS.

Pay: For pay of the Army, including the same objects, except mileage, specified under this head in the Army appropriation act for the fiscal year 1916, $1,577,017.42.

Mileage to officers and contract surgeons: For mileage to officers, acting dental surgeons, veterinarians, contract surgeons, pay clerks, and expert accountant, Inspector General's Department, when authorized by law, $20,000.

Subsistence: For subsistence of the Army, including the same objects specified under this head in the Army appropriation act for the fiscal year 1916, $753,141.

Regular supplies: For regular supplies, Quartermaster Corps, including the same objects specified under this head in the Army appropriation act for the fiscal year 1916, $667,483.08.

Incidental expenses, Quartermaster Corps: For incidental expenses, Quartermaster Corps, including the same objects specified under this head in the Army appropriation act for the fiscal year 1916, $86,960.86.

Horses for Cavalry, Artillery, Engineers, etc.: For the purchase of horses for Cavalry, Artillery, Engineers, etc., including the same objects specified under this head in the Army appropriation act for the fiscal year 1916, $1,529,000.

Barracks and quarters: For barracks and quarters, including the same objects specified under this head in the Army appropriation act for the fiscal year 1916, $31,300.

Transportation: For transportation of the Army and its supplies, including the same objects specified under this head in the Army appropriation act for the fiscal year 1916, $1,355,447.25.

Water and sewers at military posts: For water and sewers at military posts, including the same objects specified under this head in the Army appropriation act for the fiscal year 1916, $60,110.50.

Clothing, and camp and garrison equipage: For clothing, and camp and garrison equipage, including the same objects specified under this head in the Army appropriation act for the fiscal year 1916, $1,223,542.

MEDICAL DEPARTMENT.

Medical and Hospital Department: For Medical and Hospital Department, including the same objects specified under this head in the Army appropriation act for the fiscal year 1916, $37,500.

ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT.

Ordnance service: For the current expenses of the Ordnance Department, including the same objects specified under this head in the Army appropriation act for the fiscal year 1916, $20,000.

Manufacture of arms: For manufacturing, repairing, and issuing arms at the national armories, $6,000.

Ordnance stores and supplies: For overhauling, cleaning, repairing, and preserving ordnance and ordnance stores in the hands of troops and at the arsenals, posts, and depots; for purchase and manufacture of ordnance stores to fill requisitions of troops; for Infantry, Cavalry, and Artillery equipments, including horse equipments for Cavalry and Artillery, $644,000.

This bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NATIONAL DEFENSE.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask to have taken from the calendar and postponed indefinitely Order of Business 241, which is the original Senate bill 4840, reported to the Senate, as House bill 12766 has been reported and takes the place of the Senate bill on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12766) to increase the efficiency of the Military Establishment of the United States.

Mr. OVERMAN. This is the Senate committee substitute?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 12766) to increase the efficiency of the Military Establishment of the United States, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, with an amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to temporarily laying aside the unfinished business? The Chair hears none.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar under Rule VIII.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I object.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I simply want to say to the Senator that there are about 16 pages of bills on the calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We should take the bills up, then, and dispose of them in their order.

Mr. SMOOT. We have about an hour this afternoon in which it seems to me we should make at least some progress upon the calendar.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Has the Indian appropriation bill been finished?

Mr. SMOOT. It has; and the Army reorganization bill, which is now the unfinished business, has been temporarily laid aside. I thought it would be a waste of time to take up now, at this hour, a bill upon which we know there will be discussion. I thought that within the next hour we could clear perhaps three-fourth of all the bills on the calendar under Rule VIII to which there is no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, in one sense that is true; and, again, it is also true that if we allow bills not objected to to be disposed of in that way it is going to be very difficult to get up and pass upon meritorious bills on the calendar that ought to be disposed of. There ought to be a time when we can take up the calendar and dispose of bills as we reach them. We now have an hour and a half, and I do not see why we should not go on with Order of Business 18, Senate bill 706.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, if the Senator insists upon it, I have no objection at all, with the exception, of course, that the bill will not be passed to-night and the time will be wasted.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It will not be wasted. There are Senators who have views they desire to present on the subject, and they are present, and I think it would be well for them to submit their views. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 706, to amend section 260 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 29, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 28, 1916.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we thank Thee that the good men do lives after them, since all men cherish the good and abhor the evil in man; hence we pray that our lives may be worthy and full of good deeds. The name Judas Iscariot lives only as a synonym for hypocrisy, while the Cross has been glorified and made the synonym for heroism, divine love, and holy sacrifice. May we as individuals abhor evil and cleave to that which is good, that our deeds may live and our names be inscribed on the roll of honor, that we may swell the mighty chorus:

I live to hold communion
With all that is divine;
To feel there is a union
Twixt nature's heart and mine;
For wrong that needs resistance,
For the cause that lacks assistance,
For the dawning in the distance,
And the good that I can do.

In the spirit of the Lord Christ. Amen.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I understood the Journal to state that leave of absence was granted to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]. It was granted to Mr. DARROW on the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the correction will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The Journal was approved.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the urgent deficiency bill (H. R. 13043).

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] calls up the conference report on the urgent deficiency bill, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. What is the inquiry?

Mr. MANN. While a conference report is a matter of high privilege, is it in order to take it up except by unanimous consent under the rule under which we are now operating?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have read the rule, and I do not think it requires unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. The rule says immediately upon the passage of the rule the House shall proceed with the consideration of the immigration bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. A conference report is highly privileged, and a motion has to be made to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union anyway under this rule.

Mr. MANN. No; the committee automatically goes in.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The rule does not provide that; I read it.

Mr. MANN. The Speaker has ruled and we have been doing it every time the committee has sat.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Nothing in the rule requires the House to automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MANN. But that is what we have been doing.

Mr. CANNON. A conference report can stop a motion to adjourn.

Mr. MANN. Not when you have a special rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the conference report is in order under this rule. The Clerk will report it.

The conference report was read as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 442).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13043) making appropriations to supply further additional urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1916 and prior fiscal years, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 4 and 5.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, and 21, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 11: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 11, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Omit the matter inserted and stricken out by said amendment; and the Senate agree to the same.

JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
J. G. CANNON,
Managers on the part of the House.
THOMAS S. MARTIN,
JOHN F. SHAFROTH,
F. E. WARREN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement is as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13043) making appropriations to supply further additional urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1916 and prior fiscal years, submit the following detailed statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report as to each of the said amendments, namely:

No. 1: Appropriates for miscellaneous expenses for the District of Columbia Supreme Court for the fiscal years 1911, 1914, and 1915, as proposed by the Senate.

Nos. 2, 3, 4, and 5, relating to the Bureau of Yards and Docks of the Navy Department: Appropriates $52,000 for maintenance, as proposed by the Senate; and strikes out the appropriations of $85,000 and $45,000, respectively, for contingent expenses and repairs and preservation at navy yards and stations.

No. 6: Appropriates $10,000, as proposed by the Senate, for roads, bridges, trails, etc., in the Platt National Park, Okla.

Nos. 7 and 8, relating to the Department of Justice: Appropriates 55 cents for miscellaneous expenses for the fiscal year 1912 and $6 for enforcement of antitrust laws for the fiscal year 1913, as proposed by the Senate.

No. 9: Appropriates $1,500, as proposed by the Senate, for the salary of the commissioner in Glacier National Park for the fiscal year 1916.

No. 11: Strikes out the paragraphs inserted by the Senate and House of Representatives, authorizing the payment of salary to Ewing C. Bland for services as United States marshal for the western district of Missouri.

Nos. 10, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, and 21, relating to United States courts: Inserts all of the appropriations proposed by the Senate for ascertained deficiencies in appropriations for fiscal years prior to the fiscal year 1916.

JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
J. G. CANNON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I notice that the conference report strikes out entirely the provision covering Senate amendment No. 11.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The so-called Bland provision?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Senate has insisted on this provision, and the House managers believe that Mr. Bland had served in good faith and ought to be paid, but it was thought perhaps preferable to let it go over until a future time.

Mr. MANN. The House believed the man ought to be paid a certain amount and the Senate believed he ought to be paid a smaller amount, and the conferees agreed that he should not be paid anything. Well, that looks like a very reasonable compromise.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, the result accomplished, I suppose, was satisfactory to some one.

Mr. MANN. But I wondered upon what theory that could be called a compromise in conference.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, it is on the theory this man had in good faith rendered services for which he was entitled to be paid, and those gentlemen who might be supposed to represent his views expressed the belief that if the United States did not wish to pay the compensation to which he was entitled he did not care to take a portion of it.

Mr. MANN. He prefers to take his chances with future Congresses?

Mr. FITZGERALD. To try to bring it up at a later time, when there will be a different atmosphere.

Mr. MANN. Of course the item itself was subject to the point of order when it went to the House, and the point of order would very likely be made the next time if he does not want the money.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is a matter of argument.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union the bill (H. R. 13768) to supply urgent deficiencies for the Army, because of the situation on the Mexican border.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13768) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the Military Establishment for the fiscal year 1916.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to consider this bill in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is there any reason why we should not go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on the bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Except I thought perhaps we might save a little time. So far as I am aware nobody desires any considerable time to discuss anything that can not be said under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MANN. I do not desire to say anything, but it seems to me it is rather bad practice.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think we can expedite it if we consider it in the House.

Mr. BURNETT. Is it a conference report?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; it is a deficiency bill.

Mr. MANN. I do not object, but I do not like the precedent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Is this the first reading of the bill?

The SPEAKER. Yes; it is the first reading.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill for amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I wish the gentleman from New York would make a very brief statement.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, a short time ago Congress passed a resolution authorizing the President to increase the Army to the war strength. Under that resolution 29,290 men would have been added to the various arms of the service. By an order, dated March 21, the President directed that certain organizations serving outside of the mainland of the United States should not be increased to the war strength. The result of the order is that the increase in the various branches of the service within the United States will increase the Army by 25,571 men. These increases are distributed as follows: Three thousand nine hundred and fifty-six for the Cavalry, 19,300 in the Infantry, 907 in the Field Artillery, 13,076 in the Signal Corps, 350 in the Ordnance Department, 1,300 in the Quartermaster Corps, 60 in the Engineers, and 302 in the Coast Artillery. Immediately upon the approval of the joint resolution recruiting was started. Directions to the United States forces on the border to proceed into Mexico for the purpose of apprehending Villa necessitated that certain equipment and outfit be acquired that was not then in the possession of the department. One hundred and twelve motor trucks for transportation purposes have been acquired and a number of horses and other equipment has been purchased.

As a result of the joint resolution increasing the various branches of the service, it is necessary to acquire 5,000 additional horses for the Cavalry, 1,050 for the Artillery, 450 riding horses for Infantry regiments, and 10 bell horses for pack trains. Six hundred thousand dollars is recommended for the Signal Corps. Five hundred thousand dollars of that sum to be available for the purchase of high-power aeroplanes and the necessary equipment to operate them. There are now with the Army on the border eight aeroplanes in serviceable condition.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield just there?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. What is the cost of a high-power aeroplane such as is contemplated to be purchased there?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Twelve thousand dollars, which figure includes spare parts. This appropriation is sufficient to acquire 24 aeroplanes, with the necessary motor trucks and other equipment. The organization is in squadrons, with 12 planes to a squadron. It is the purpose of the department at this time to acquire but 8 planes, with the necessary motor trucks and other necessary equipment. Due to the uncertainty, however, of the situation on the border, and anxious to be provided for any emergency, the department requests that the appropriation be made sufficient so that, if desirable or necessary, the additional planes and equipment may be obtained prior to the 1st of July. If no necessity arises for the acquisition of the aeroplanes prior to the 1st of July the money is to continue available during the next fiscal year and to be part of the appropriation for the service for the next fiscal year.

Mr. BENNET. Will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BENNET. The Aero Club of America has sent literature—I do not know how widespread, but I got some of it—in which they said we had only three or four low-power aeroplanes in Mexico, and that the reason—and I am not indorsing this now—and the reason we had no more aeroplanes was the very culpable neglect of Congress to make any appropriations. I notice that in the Army bill last year we appropriated $600,000 for the Signal Corps service. I want to ask my colleague what was the real fact in relation to the action of Congress in connection with aeroplanes?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The statement of Gen. Scriven is to the effect that there are eight serviceable machines on the border. However, the high altitudes in which the planes are operating there has made the operation somewhat more difficult. The general stated that they had 23 machines in all. He said, when before the Committee on Appropriations:

> At San Diego there are 10 machines, but they are all training machines, and a training machine is not considered suitable for the work, for the reason that they are slower and heavier machines than scouting machines and land more slowly.

In the Philippines there are four machines that could be used. At Columbus, N. Mex., he said, there are eight machines, and, as far as I can make out from the reports of the papers, and so on, they are all accounted for, with the possible exception of one. Lieut. Gorrall was lost and ran out of gasoline and had to land; but reports in this morning's papers state that one machine that had a broken axle—by running into a bank in the dark—has been repaired, so that there is now only one machine that may be out of commission, or may not be, I do not know; at all events, eight machines are all we have there.

They are operating at an altitude of about 8,000 feet. It is desired to obtain some of the later type of the more highly powered machines. The American manufacturers in all their contracts with foreign Governments at this time have clauses which permit them to deliver to the Government of the United States in case of necessity, or in case they are called upon, machines being made under contract for foreign Governments.

It was stated that one of the difficulties with the machines in the United States is that we have not developed the motor to that degree of perfection that obtains in motors in other countries. It is stated that the machines that are being sent abroad by American manufacturers are used with the motor made in this country only in the training schools, but when the machines are sent to the front for use in actual service a foreign motor is substituted for the American motor.

A situation now exists where the Army is in the field, and the necessity for these planes is apparent; and the committee unanimously, with no division in it, recommended the sum stated to be necessary in order to provide adequately for the service.

Mr. BENNET. So far as my colleague is informed, I take it from his remarks that Congress has appropriated whatever sums for aeroplanes the War Department has asked for. Is that a correct statement?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not certain as to the appropriations. But I have the figures here. The estimate for 1916, the current year, was $700,000. The appropriation is $600,000. For 1915 the estimate was $550,000, and the appropriation was $500,000. For 1914 the estimate was $375,000, and the appropriation $375,000.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Congress has practically appropriated within $150,000 all that was estimated during the past few years; that is, out of total estimates aggregating $1,625,000 Congress has appropriated all the estimates except $150,000.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. I think the gentleman is mistaken about having appropriated the estimate last year.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not mistaken, because I have taken the precaution to read the figures from the records.

Mr. BENNET. It is $100,000 less.

Mr. GARDNER. I did not catch what the gentleman said.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I said that I have taken the precaution to read the figures from the records.

Mr. GARDNER. I understood the gentleman to say that Congress had appropriated the entire estimate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I said the estimate was $700,000 and the appropriation $600,000 for the year 1916, but during the three years Congress had appropriated $150,000 less than was estimated, and the total appropriation was $1,475,000. I would say that that is practically the sum estimated by the department.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will try.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the machines we have ordered be equipped with the same high-powered motors as the machines we have been sending abroad have been equipped with?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The purpose is to purchase machines of the very latest and most highly developed type.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Do we have to order the foreign motor?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No. We will have to use American motors. We can not purchase foreign motors at this time.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I understood the gentleman to say we did not manufacture in this country motors of the same high power as the foreign-made motors.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I say that we do not manufacture as good a motor, but we have to get along with the best we can get. No foreign motor can be obtained at this time.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. BENNET. Just to permit me to call attention to the fact that this Congress is being criticized all over the United States because we have not 40 or 50 high-powered aeroplanes when the estimates show that if we had given the department every dollar that they asked for we could have had only eight more high-powered aeroplanes than we have. Throughout the country there is entirely too much criticism of Congress.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am very well acquainted with a number of these estimable gentlemen in the Aero Club of America. Their fad is aeronautics. They seem to imagine that everybody in the United States should think only about aeroplanes. They favor the appropriation of more money for aeroplanes for various branches of the service than for any other possible thing. They are high-minded, honest, patriotic, intelligent faddists. They do good work, although they are, like most of the critics of Congress, extreme in their criticisms and lacking in information. [Laughter.]

Mr. BENNET. I notice that they had to admit that Congress appropriated money for 60 aviators, and the War Department was unable to find more than 15 aviators in the country, so that Congress appropriated more for aviators than could be used.

Mr. FITZGERALD. My recollection is that last year the War Department was able to obtain only 25 officers under the law to train as aviators.

Mr. BENNET. I think it was fewer than that. I think it was only 15.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think I made a liberal statement.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. BARNHART. For three years, maybe four, Members of Congress have been getting at least weekly grists of letters, sent them from this Aero Club of America, and I understand that the newspapers, big and little, throughout the country are being exploited by this Aero Club. I would like to know whether the gentleman from New York has information as to whether the money to promulgate this great advertising scheme is furnished by manufacturers of aeroplanes, or whether it is furnished by these enthusiasts that he speaks of?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I believe these men are enthusiastic. It is their hobby, and they ride it.

Mr. BARNHART. Do they pay for it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I believe they pay for it. They have a very fine establishment in New York. They are men of large means, and I think they pay for all that publicity themselves.

Mr. BARNHART. Are any of them engaged in manufacturing aeroplanes?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. If what I get from some of the letters that I have received from the president of this Aero Club, referred to by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART], can be relied on, they are more interested in the construction of battleships than they are in the development or manufacture of aircraft. If my recollection serves me aright, too, it seems that Congress, as to the Navy Department at least, has appropriated more money than has been used by the department for the manufacture and development of aircraft.

Last Congress I offered an amendment to the appropriation bill to have the Government establish a plant to manufacture aeroplanes, where the aircraft—both the engines and otherwise—could perhaps have been developed, but my amendment was voted down. If such a plant was established, we would perhaps now be leading the European countries instead of depending upon them for engines, and so forth. In my judgment it is due largely to the heads of the department not being willing to prepare for the manufacture by the Government instead of depending on private manufacturers, who for the last year and a half have been more interested in the extortionate prices and large profits they are able to get from the belligerent nations than in the development of their machines. If my recollection serves me right, the public records will bear out that statement.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, just one question. Will the gentleman from New York kindly inform the House about this, because it is rather a revelation to me that American manufacturers are not able to make as good an engine as is made abroad. What is the cause of that? Is the department able to give any reason for that?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am unable to say, except that it frequently happens that in some of the foreign countries they develop and perfect things more quickly than we do, but I think that eventually the American manufacturer equals, if he does not excel, them.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I think it is conceded by everybody everywhere that the American automobile engine is the best that there is in the world, and that we make as good an automobile here as they make any place in the world; and the same kind of an engine that runs an automobile will run an aeroplane.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They need lighter engines, and they have trouble with the ones made here.

Mr. MADDEN. We have the facilities to make the best machines in the world, and we make them, and there is no reason why we can not compete with any nation in the world, and we are doing it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; we are not doing it on aeroplane engines.

Mr. MADDEN. We are making a higher class automobile than any other country in the world.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not talking about automobiles.

Mr. MADDEN. And we are making a better class of engine than England or France or any other country. Our automobiles are of a higher type; they last longer; they do more work at less cost; they use less gasoline, with less friction. They will run farther without repairs, and the result of all that is that, instead of buying automobiles from abroad, as we used to do, we are selling automobiles all over the world, and it is recognized that the machines that are made here are superior to any machines that are made anywhere; and the same type of engine that is used in the automobile is the type of engine that must be used in the aeroplane.

Mr. BARNHART. Oh, no.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Is the gentleman aware that the manufacturers of some very high-grade automobiles in this country are buying their engines abroad with which to equip their automobiles?

Mr. MADDEN. They may be doing that because they have not the facilities to make them.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. No; it is because they get a better engine abroad, because they can not make as good an engine here.

Mr. MADDEN. We do make them.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. No.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will concede that the gentleman knows more about automobiles than I do.

Mr. Speaker, the other items in this bill are to provide for the pay of the men and for supplies of different characters required by the increase in the Army authorized by the joint resolution. I may say that the situation in the department at this time is a little unusual. Unexpectedly, because of very aggravating conditions, orders were issued to the troops on the border to enter Mexico for the purpose of apprehending Villa. I do not think there is any dissent in the country as to the propriety of that action. However much we may desire to avoid war, we do not propose that any bandit shall raid American territory, kill our citizens, and destroy our property without prompt and efficient action on our part to punish those who act in such manner. [Applause.] Haste was essential. Villa has been engaged in warfare for some time, and has been noted for the rapidity of his movements. Our expedition was organized as rapidly as possible. The department was compelled in some instances to issue orders for supplies, although there was no money available and although it contravened certain provisions of the Revised Statutes. The matter was mentioned to me informally, and I made the statement that under the conditions that existed, in my opinion Congress would be more likely to criticize the administration for failing to act because of the lack of funds than it would be to criticize the department for doing everything necessary, regardless of authority to do so, relying upon the fact that, without any dissent whatever, Congress would approve the action of the administration and provide the funds necessary to pay for whatever equipment had been ordered. This bill is being urged at this time so that that situation may be relieved and that the funds may be available, that the department may do everything necessary to carry out the purposes of the expedition.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. As I understand the bill, there is no provision in it for the purchase of additional machine guns.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. There is no necessity for it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no necessity for it, and they could not be had if there were. This bill is to provide for this emergency. The fortifications bill, which will be reported in the very near future, will, I think, satisfy everybody with the provision which it will make for matters of that character.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I mention it simply because in various newspapers throughout the country there has been a great deal of entirely unfounded criticism. As an illustration of this I will mention one editorial which I saw, criticizing the Army for using the Lewis machine gun——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Which they are not using at all.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. They are not using at all; but this editorial criticized Congress for not supplying the Army with machine guns. I understand that we have appropriated something like $150,000 a year for several years, which has not been used by the department for the purchase of machine guns.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not recall that; but the type of gun is always determined by the ordnance experts in the department and not by Members of Congress.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Certainly; but this article was criticizing Congress on the assumption that it had pursued a course just the opposite to what it has pursued. In fact, the department has not been using the money that has been appropriated for the purpose.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Despite the fact that there seems at times to be a somewhat widespread belief that Congress consists of the greatest aggregation of incompetent and unpatriotic citizens that could be gathered together from all the four corners of the United States, it manages somehow to blunder into doing what is pretty nearly the right thing most of the time.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman from New York will permit me, it is only proper to say that the criticism is not only undeserved but frequently undeserved touching the Army and the equipment and supplies of the Army. The reason why the moneys have not recently been expended touching machine guns has been explained repeatedly in hearings before various committees dealing with the matter; they were undertaking to get the very latest type of gun, and properly so. The Army has now sufficient machine guns, that are good guns, to take care of its needs as they exist to-day in Mexico, and are likely to exist in the near future.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. To interrogate the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to be interrogated. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. About 10 days ago the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs brought in a resolution which was unanimously passed by the House, the purpose being to bring the Army up to its full strength. Is this urgent deficiency bill to put into effect the terms of that resolution?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is the result of the joint resolution and the conditions on our border.

Mr. Speaker, the total amount carried by the bill is $8,611,502.11, and that sum is based on the estimates for the additional 25,000 men for a period of three months, commencing on the 1st of April to the 30th of June.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I am a member of the subcommittee that reported this bill. It was reported to the House unanimously by the full committee. I do not desire to take much time. I indorse what the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] had said touching the items in the bill, and yet I want to make a very few remarks. I recognize that this is a time for action and not for criticism, and yet it is proper, I think, due to myself, due to the House, due to this Congress, to call attention to the fact that when history comes to be written, as it will be written and ought to be written, for the purpose not so much of criticism but for the guidance of future Congresses touching proper appropriations for the Navy and for the Army for the national defense.

In my time I have seen many Presidents and many Congresses elected, and am old enough to recollect back as far as 1844 that one party put into its platform a plank for the annexation of Texas, and in the very next line a paragraph declaring that our northern border should be "Fifty-four forty or fight," which is now the northern boundary between British Columbia and Alaska. Polk was elected President upon that platform.

Texas was annexed. And yet during the very progress of that campaign the Secretary of State, Calhoun, was negotiating with Great Britain for the establishment of a boundary at 49 degrees north latitude between the United States and British Columbia. We owned up to the Alaskan boundary by discovery, and that treaty was consummated under Polk's administration and was ratified in the Senate after a great fight, opposed by Douglas, who was a Member of the House, and by Hannegan and many other Democratic Senators in the Senate, as is recorded by Benton in his Thirty Years in the United States Senate.

We lost British Columbia, and it has been to our sorrow since that time. You may say that this is ancient history, but the results show what party platforms amount to and what the action of Congress from time to time amounts to. The results are with us now, and will be with us always.

While I indorse these appropriations, I am not here to indorse the action which makes the appropriations, so far as the condition on the Mexican border and in Mexico are concerned, absolutely necessary as to the production of these conditions which render the appropriations necessary. The historian will write in the future whatever may be the result on the border or in Mexico.

At the beginning of the Mexican War, which resulted in the annexation of Texas, all parties, while they had much language before the war began—all parties, including Lincoln, who was at that time in the Congress—solidly, unanimously, and most amply provided in a hurry for the support of the Army and the Navy, as this House is solidly providing for this appropriation and others that are necessary not only in Mexico but for the national defense. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums are appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the Military Establishment for the fiscal year 1916, namely:

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. Two weeks ago, when the resolution authorizing the President to increase the Army to its full war strength for the purposes of the expedition into Mexico came up, I found myself in the uncomfortable position of voting against the entire House on the resolution. It was with a deep sense of responsibility and with an intense feeling of sadness that I did vote alone, against the entire House, on the Mexican question. I believe, however, that I was right and that you were wrong. The President now realizes that in the blundering treatment of Mexico no more serious blunder has been committed than this so-called punitive expedition.

The present conflagration in Europe started with a punitive expedition by Austria-Hungary against helpless Serbia. Look at the history of colonial expansion in the last half century and you will find that one-half of the wars were preceded by punitive expeditions.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. I will yield if my time is extended.

Mr. BURNETT. I shall object to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York declines to yield.

Mr. LONDON. You can not chase a bandit with an army of 50,000 men, just as you can not use a locomotive to chase a bird. The entire proposition is an indefensible one. Within a week or two weeks you will find your Army deep in the territory of Mexico and you will find the Mexican people rallying around that bandit as a patriot. Every day this invasion continues you are increasing the strength of the bandit Villa or of some similar bandit. Only yesterday the President was compelled to appeal to the press to stop inflaming passions, to stop the spreading of misleading news. I fear that in spite of the pacific and honorable intentions of the President he will be forced by a dishonest press, by a press dictated by most unclean motives of its owners, to maintain a large army in Mexico and to spread out the area of invasion. Then you will find yourselves at war, not with a bandit but with the Mexican people. That is why I voted against the resolution, and if I had more time now I hope I could convince a good many of you that this punitive expedition into Mexico is one of the most serious blunders in the President's career and one of the most serious blunders on the part of this Congress. What I would do is this: I would have the National Guard, I would have the Regular troops, I would have a citizen army protect every inch of the border of the United States; I would vote an appropriation of hundreds of millions of dollars to protect every inch of the border of the United States, but I would not permit a single soldier to invade or enter the territory of another people, because that means laying the foundation for a long war, and war is a calamity.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, continuing my argument against the "punitive" expedition into Mexico, and under leave to extend my remarks, I respectfully submit that the danger of invading the territory of a friendly nation is hardly appreciated by the great masses of the people.

It is scarcely believable that this satanic performance of Villa was a mere accident. The truth will be known some day, and the world will learn that the bandit, Villa, was the mere tool of interests which sought to embroil the United States in a war with Mexico.

That there are powerful interests whom nothing would suit better than the annexation of Mexican territory can not be successfully contradicted.

The President is evidently alarmed over the situation. May I quote from his appeal to the press the significant words:

The object of this traffic in falsehood is obvious. It is to create intolerable friction between the Government of the United States and the de facto government of Mexico for the purpose of bringing about intervention in the interest of certain American owners of Mexican properties.

When we compare the total wealth of Mexico with the proportion of that wealth held by American capitalists we will understand the reason for the President's alarm.

In Consular Report No. 168, prepared by Consul Letcher at Chihuahua, and published July 18, 1912, the total valuation of wealth within the borders of Mexico is placed at $2,434,241,422, of which Americans owned $1,057,770,000, or 43 per cent, while Mexicans owned only $792,187,242, or 32½ per cent of the total. The remainder of the wealth of Mexico was held by British, French, German, and other foreign capitalists. Consul Letcher explained that he secured these statistics from Mexican federal and state reports and from other sources equally trustworthy.

This report shows, among other things, the following items of comparison between American and Mexican ownership in Mexico:

Class of property.	Holdings.		Per cent American.
	American.	Mexican.
Railway stocks	$235,464,000	$125,440,000	53
Railway bonds	408,926,000	12,275,000	72
Mines	223,000,000	7,500,000	77
Smelters	26,500,000	7,200,000	72
National bonds	52,000,000	21,000,000	26
Oil business	15,000,000	650,000	58
Rubber industry	15,000,000	4,500,000	68

The most notable items of Mexican property held chiefly by the Mexicans are houses, ranches, live stock, bank deposits, and retail stores—none of which would naturally be acquired by foreign capitalists in preference to railroads or mines.

All of the chief industrial, financial, and manufacturing enterprises are owned or controlled by foreign capitalists. The Mexican people have been dominated by the worst form of a foreign aristocracy—the aristocracy of foreign capital, and in this cash aristocracy American capitalism has a larger representation than all other foreign capitalists combined. What the pacification of Mexico will mean to American capital can also be gathered from the statistics of imports from and exports to Mexico.

The administration is unwittingly playing into the hands of the annexationists.

With American troops on Mexican territory, the de facto government of Mexico is placed in an impossible position. If it yields and does not resist the march of American troops, it will bring upon itself the charge of betraying its own people. If it resists, we will find ourselves at war with Mexico without a formal declaration of war. In any event, we run the risk of strengthening the hand of Villa.

Our losses have so far been insignificant. Should there be a serious loss of life, should some of our soldiers be ambushed, should some outrage be perpetrated upon the wounded, the aroused indignation of the people of America and the instinctive passion for revenge which is still strong in men's hearts will compel a continuance of the war and the overrunning of Mexico. Thus an expedition which had for its origin a police measure for the capture and apprehension of a bandit will expand into a war with a friendly nation. The more sacrifice is made in the hunt after the elusive Villa, the more deeply into Mexican territory he will lure the pursuing American Army, the wider area which will be occupied by the invading force of the United States, the greater will become the pressure that the Army remain in Mexico until that unfortunate land is completely pacified, the more insistent will become the demand that the occupied territory be retained under control of American arms, and the stronger will be the appeal for the annexation of Mexican territory.

Sweden, Norway, Holland, and Switzerland have, during the last 20 months, taxed themselves to the utmost to defend their borders against attack and to prevent the violation of their territory.

As I said before, I would cheerfully vote any appropriation which may be necessary to defend the frontier of the United States.

There is a small group of workers who argue that because the working class is oppressed the worker has no home to defend. It is true that the working class occupies the mere subcellar of the structure of society, but it is entirely due to ignorance, inertia, indifference, and lack of understanding on the part of the working people themselves. It would be just as foolish for the working people of Holland to say that they will refuse to build the dikes which protect Holland from the invasion of the ocean, because when free from the danger the capitalists will take advantage of the worker, as it would be for the working class in America to say that, because the capitalistic interests largely control the life of the country, the worker has no home to defend.

The stoker on a luxurious ocean liner, covered with sweat and grime, deep in the hold of the ship, underpaid and despised, the last one to escape danger, is as surely interested in the welfare of that ship as the "bloated capitalist" in the first cabin. They are both passengers on the same ship.

Knowing all this, I draw a sharp line of demarcation between a war of defense and a war of aggression. We must defend against attack. No sacrifice can be too great for that. We must not permit ourselves to be the aggressors. We must sternly oppose any policy that may lead to war.

I protest against the invasion of Mexican territory. It is not too late to withdraw to the border. My vote against the emergency appropriation is a vote of warning and of protest.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations for some information. I was called out of the Chamber when he made his statement. Is the amount carried in this emergency bill to meet the military necessity of the Mexican situation?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. AUSTIN. The eight million dollars. Will the gentleman tell the House how much money we expended in connection with sending the Army and Navy to Vera Cruz, Mexico?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know.

Mr. AUSTIN. Is not that information in the possession of the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not. I never inquired.

Mr. AUSTIN. Have we made an appropriation covering it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No.

Mr. AUSTIN. Has an estimate been submitted to the committee?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There may have been some items included in deficiency bills in previous sessions of Congress, but I do not recall them now.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF SIGNAL OFFICER.

Signal Service of the Army: For expenses of the Signal Service of the Army, including the same objects specified under this head in the Army appropriation act for the fiscal year 1916, and for radio installations, motor cycles and motor-driven vehicles used for technical purposes, $600,000, to remain available during the fiscal year 1917: Provided, however, That not more than $500,000 of the foregoing appropriation shall be used for the purchase, maintenance, operation, and repair of airships and other aerial machines and accessories in the aviation section; and for the purchase, maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled, passenger-carrying vehicles, which may be necessary for the aviation section.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. Reference has been made to the number of aeroplanes now in the War Department. I do not know what the number is. I notice by the morning papers a statement that of the aeroplanes on the Mexican border all but two are out of commission, that only two are available. It seems to me that this ought to bring home to us the fact that while we may sit and dream about everything being in perfect shape for national defense, yet after all, we really learn by experience here and in the Army. I am not making any criticism of the Army. They are learning now by actual experience what they need to know. This country will only learn by actual experience, and the little trouble down on the border ought to make us appreciate the fact that we can only learn by experience; that the Army itself only learns by experience; and that while we nominally have eight aeroplanes there and possibly ought to have eighty, according to the newspapers we have but two. We are not in very good communication with what troops we have in Mexico.

Reference has been made to the Aero Club of America. Goodness knows, I am under no obligation to them. I think possibly they have more severely criticized me than any other Member of the House, but perhaps that is only because they send me copies of their criticisms and letters, and so forth. They are doing a good work in trying to make us appreciate the fact that under modern war conditions aeroplanes are absolutely essential. On the Mexican border we ought to be in almost hourly communication with the troops that we have by aeroplanes. We ought to have had aeroplanes enough there to have located the man we are seeking. No one knows where he is. The only way we can find him will be when we construct aeroplanes enough to locate him, and probably by that time he will have hidden himself in a hole, where no aeroplane operator can see him.

Mr. Speaker, while I am on my feet I desire to announce that I am going to ask, if no one else does, for a roll call on this bill, in the hope that it will demonstrate that the American Congress when money is needed to protect our border or to take care of our troops will always provide it without a dissenting voice. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois has referred to statements in the press to the effect that there are but two serviceable aeroplanes on the border. Gen. Scriven is the head of the Signal Corps. He appeared before the Committee on Appropriations on Saturday morning and stated at that time that there were eight serviceable machines at Columbus, N. Mex.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I simply wish the facts to be known, so that no one will be misled by inaccurate newspaper statements.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, did not Gen. Scriven state to the committee that his statement was based on newspaper reports; that is, his statement as to whether these machines are in order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; his statement was that, as to reported accidents, he had seen an account in the morning newspapers of a machine having broken down.

Mr. MANN. And he stated that from the press report. The press reports this morning are to the effect that all of the machines, except two, have had accidents happen to them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not place entire confidence in reports about the conditions relating to troops on the border for publication, on account of the difficulty of getting accurate information.

Mr. MANN. I do not say that at all in the way of criticism.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand; but I do not wish to be misunderstood about the situation.

Mr. MANN. But the fact is they are not enough; everybody knows that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They are asking this money to get more, and we are trying to accommodate them. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. In the last Congress—in fact, ever since I have been a Member of Congress—I have tried to exercise my influence to secure the development and construction of aircraft and submarines. One reason perhaps was, I believe that when they are fully developed the battleships will be proven to the satisfaction of everybody to be obsolete and inoperative, and the money that is being put into them, in my judgment, is a waste of the people's money. As I stated before, I have asked, by way of offering amendments, to have the Government manufacture, or the establishment of a plant to manufacture, aircraft, for the reason I wanted the Government to have the benefit of the efficiency of our Army and Navy engineers, who I think are the best in the world, in the development of engines and the improvement of our submarines, instead of being in the rear of European countries. If this plan had been adopted, in my opinion we would now be in the lead in regard to the development and manufacture of aircraft; and it seems to me now, after the experience we have had that our Army and Navy officials have been unable to secure the manufacture by private yards, that Congress should lose no time in authorizing a plant to be established for the purpose of developing and the manufacture of aircraft. Not only, in my opinion, would we get more efficient machines, but while the Army and Navy officials were manufacturing or looking after the manufacture of aircraft, they would also obtain an experience that would be advantageous to them in the operation of these machines, and perhaps we would have more efficient operators of aircraft; and I will at the opportune time——

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Again strive to secure the establishment of a Government plant for this purpose. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GORDON. What would the gentleman do if all of these machines and all the different parts and appliances were covered by patent, as I understand is the case? How would the Government get control of those?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. The Government can secure these patents as easily as any private manufacturer, in my judgment, if we will exercise our influence and prerogatives. It is only a matter of earnest effort on the part of our Government officials in striving to secure the best that they can for the Government for this purpose. That is my opinion, and while gentlemen may be wiser in regard to those matters than I am, my opinion leads me to believe the Government can do those things. Perhaps they may have to purchase patents, and so forth, and then if we will utilize the efficiency of the Army and Navy engineers, in my opinion, they will develop those patents that will probably be an improvement upon anything that we have at the present time.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I will.

Mr. BAILEY. I would like to ask if the aeroplane we have to-day is less efficient than that used in the European war, either by the Germans, French, or British?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Well, I can not answer that question; I will say to my friend that I am informed that American manufacturers are manufacturing aircraft for the European belligerent nations, which is evidence that they are to some degree at least satisfactory to those countries.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 374, nays 1, not voting 59, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I was a second late on the call, but I would have voted "yea" had I been present.

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Speaker, I was not in the Hall when the roll was being called, but I was on the way. Had I been present, I would have voted "yea."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call my name.

The name of Mr. CLARK of Missouri was called, and he voted "yea."

The Clerk announced the following pair:

Mr. GUERNSEY with Mr. MCGILLICUDDY.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. GARRETT, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence, indefinitely, on account of illness of mother.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

PATTERSON, GA., March 28, 1916.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: On account of the failing health of my father, I am compelled to ask an extension of my leave for another week.

Very sincerely, yours,

J. R. WALKER.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, on the request of Mr. GREENE of Vermont, change of reference was made of the bill S. 1425 from the Committee on Military Affairs to the Committee on War Claims.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. On what?

Mr. CRAMTON. On the general subject of national defense.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

IMMIGRATION.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10384) to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States, with Mr. SAUNDERS in the chair.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend page 14, line 12, by inserting in front of the word "published" the word "or" and by striking out after the word "published" the words "or distributed."

Mr. SABATH. To what page does the gentleman refer?

Mr. BENNET. Page 14, line 12.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment from the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, line 12, after the word "printed," insert the word "or," and after the word "published" strike out the words "or distributed," so that the lines as amended will read:

SEC. 6. That it shall be unlawful and be deemed a violation of section 5 of this act to induce, assist, encourage, or solicit or attempt to induce, assist, encourage, or solicit any alien to come into the United States by promise of employment through advertisements printed or published in any foreign country, whether such promise is true or false, and either the civil or criminal penalty or both imposed by said section shall be applicable to such a case.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, late yesterday afternoon, just before the committee rose, I called the attention of the committee to the situation to which this amendment is directed. I agree with the Committee on Immigration in relation to publications in a foreign country. I can see the merit of that. But we have a border reaching from Detroit to the Pacific Ocean where our country adjoins Canada. Canada is just as much a foreign country as any other country; and, under this bill, if a merchant in Detroit, or a factory in Detroit or at any other place, like Niagara Falls, for example, prints an advertisement, published in America, circulated largely in America, asking for help of any kind, and that paper goes across the Canadian border, as our papers do, and any person in Canada—man or woman—reads that advertisement, and comes into the United States in consequence of that advertisement, and goes to that factory without disclosing the fact that he or she comes because of that advertisement, and is employed, the man who employs that person is subject to the penalties of section 5, which are both civil and criminal, the civil penalty being $1,000 fine per person.

I do not think it was the intention of the committee—and it ought not to be the act of Congress—to punish a man who publishes in the United States, for circulation in the United States, an advertisement in an American paper, when it accidentally falls into the hands of a Canadian, who takes advantage of the advertisement and comes to this country, only across the border.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Does not the gentleman think it wise and proper, as to an advertisement addressed to anybody who may read it, giving notice of the fact that employment is open or help is needed, that a distinction should be made between that kind of an advertisement and a special communication sent to an individual, soliciting or offering employment? One might be entirely harmless and proper, and the other might be wrong.

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman asks, Do I not think it would be wise? Wise on the part of whom?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Wise on the part of the law to distinguish between the two cases.

Mr. BENNET. I think there would be danger of weakening the law if we tried to do it. I see point in what the gentleman has in mind, but, while on my feet in this way, I do not know that I could phrase an amendment that would cover the point. But I do say that if the committee strikes out these words "or distribute" we will protect an American who advertises in an American newspaper.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. HAYES. The gentleman would not claim, I think, that in the case he puts a man could be prosecuted criminally because of such publication or distribution, because it is the intent that is the controlling factor.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENNET. Why, Mr. Chairman, as we go along further in this bill instances will be brought to the attention of the committee where the committee has attempted, at least, to eliminate the whole question of intent out of an American prosecution. The gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] asks me whether it can be done. It is done in the State of New York in one instance. I will give the gentleman an instance—where a man is found with empty bottles in his possession, and the law presumes the attempt to appropriate them in violation of the branding act.

Mr. HAYES. The gentleman should understand that if the statute makes that presumption, that is not the usual presumption of law. There must be a criminal intent before you can prosecute a man for a felony or other crime.

Mr. BENNET. I will say to the gentleman frankly that what I think would happen to a man under this would be that he would be sued for a thousand dollars and he would have no defense.

Mr. HAYES. The gentleman must recognize the fact that this fine is imposed by immigration officials, and I am sure he would not claim in a case of that kind, where it was clearly not the intention of having an advertisement of that kind distributed in Canada for the purpose of inducing immigration, that the officials of the United States would prosecute a man under those circumstances.

Mr. BENNET. All I can say is that it has been done.

Mr. HAYES. Then the man under whom it was done should have been removed from office.

Mr. BENNET. I remember the old story of the man who was confined in jail and who sent for his lawyer, and his lawyer said to him, "You can not be put in jail for that," and the man said, "Yes; but I am here." The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LOBECK] told me yesterday of a case in Omaha almost on all fours, where the advertisement, as I recall it, was circulated in an Omaha newspaper and read in Canada, and a woman came into the United States from Canada because of that advertisement in an Omaha newspaper, and the man who put the advertisement in that American newspaper was sued.

I think that is all wrong. But I am not standing up here and saying that the department ought not to execute the law. It is a pretty hard law when the only defense you can put up is that the department could not enforce it. Unless this is stricken out the department will have cases of that kind.

Mr. HAYES. But the publisher had no part in its distribution?

Mr. BENNET. No.

Mr. HAYES. How in the world could he be liable for something that he had not done? I think the gentleman is building mountains out of nothing here. I can not understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, the contention of the gentleman from New York is so absurd that I move that all debate be now closed.

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman has the right to do that, but it is not absurd.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I renew my motion that the debate be now closed.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

Mr. BURNETT. I make a point of order that that is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama has moved to close the debate. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. BURNETT. I ask for a division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 82, noes 34.

Mr. BENNET. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. BURNETT and Mr. BENNET.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 114, noes 34.

Accordingly the motion to close debate was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is closed, and the question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET].

Mr. BENNET. May we have the amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BENNET: Page 14, line 12, after the word "printed," insert the word "or," and after the word "published" strike out the words "or distributed."

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That it shall be unlawful for any person, including any transportation company other than railway lines entering the United States from foreign contiguous territory, or the owner, master, agent, or consignee of any vessel to bring to the United States either from a foreign country or any insular possession of the United States any alien afflicted with idiocy, insanity, imbecility, feeble-mindedness, epilepsy, constitutional psycopathic inferiority, chronic alcoholism, tuberculosis in any form, or a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease, and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor that any alien so brought to the United States was afflicted with any of the said diseases or disabilities at the time of foreign embarkation, and that the existence of such disease or disability might have been detected by means of a competent medical examination at such time, such person or transportation company, or the master, agent, owner, or consignee of any such vessel shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $200, and in addition a sum equal to that paid by such alien for his transportation from the initial point of departure, indicated in his ticket, to the port of arrival, for each and every violation of the provisions of this section, such latter sum to be delivered by the collector of customs to the alien on whose account assessed. It shall also be unlawful for any such person to bring to any port of the United States any alien afflicted with any mental defect other than those above specifically named, or physical defect of a nature which may affect his ability to earn a living, as contemplated in section 3 of this act, and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor that any alien so brought to the United States was so afflicted at the time of foreign embarkation, and that the existence of such mental or physical defect might have been detected by means of a competent medical examiner at such time, such person shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $25, and in addition a sum equal to that paid by such alien for his transportation from the initial point of departure, indicated in his ticket, to the port of arrival, for each and every violation of this provision, such latter sum to be delivered by the collector of customs to the alien for whose account assessed. It shall also be unlawful for any such person to bring to any port of the United States any alien who is excluded by the provisions of section 3 of this act because unable to read, or who are Hindus, or who can not become eligible, under existing law, to become a citizen of the United States by naturalization, as provided in section 3 of this act, and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor that these disabilities might have been detected by the exercise of reasonable precaution prior to the departure of such aliens from a foreign port, such person shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $200, and in addition a sum equal to that paid by such alien for his transportation from the initial point of departure, indicated in his ticket, to the port of arrival, for each and every violation of this provision, such latter sum to be delivered by the collector of customs to the alien on whose account assessed. And no vessel shall be granted clearance papers pending the determination of the question of the liability to the payment of such fine, or while the fine remains unpaid, nor shall such fine be remitted or refunded: Provided, That clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such questions upon the deposit of a sum sufficient to cover such fine.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a committee amendment in the section, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 18, line 16, insert the word "of" at the beginning of the line.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BURNETT: Page 19, line 20, strike out the period and insert a colon and add "Provided, That nothing contained in this section shall be construed to subject transportation companies to a fine for bringing to ports of the United States aliens who are by any of the provisions or exceptions to section 3 hereof exempted from the excluding provisions of said section."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama desire recognition on this amendment?

Mr. BURNETT. I do not care to discuss it. I think its purpose is obvious. Some members of the committee expressed a doubt as to whether aliens who are fleeing from religious persecution would be permitted by the steamship companies to take passage on their vessels, even if they were admissible to this country. The committee were of the opinion that if they were admissible aliens there could not be any such thing as a penalty on the steamship company, but in order to leave no doubt about that matter the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL] offered an amendment, which the committee accepted, and this is that amendment. It is offered in order that there may be no doubt about it.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, when the committee proposes a good amendment, I suppose a Member will be permitted to rise and say that it is a good amendment, despite the vote of a moment ago.

This is a good amendment. It does not go far enough, and after the amendment is adopted, as I assume it will be, as it ought to be, I propose to follow it up with a perfecting amendment which, it seems to me, is absolutely necessary.

In these five minutes I also want to say one other thing. The controversial points of this bill were the literacy test, the head tax—to which a considerable number of Members were opposed—and the Japanese section, in opposition to which I stood nearly alone. Those parts of the bill have been passed; but for six years I was on the Committee on Immigration, and for nearly three years on the Immigration Commission, and I do know something about the immigration laws, and I do not think this Congress has yet got to the point where a man ought to be criticized for rising to propose a perfecting amendment. The House has a right to vote it down if Members do not agree with it; but so long as an amendment is in the line of what a Member on his responsibility thinks is a perfecting amendment, he ought to be treated with courtesy and consideration, and his amendment ought not to be called ridiculous.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has a perfecting amendment that he wishes to offer?

Mr. BENNET. To the section.

Mr. GARDNER. Not to the amendment?

Mr. BENNET. Oh, no.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 18, line 24, strike out the words "because unable to read or."

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I wish to congratulate the Committee on Immigration on the broadening of the literacy test. I want to congratulate them on the amendment which they have just offered, which was necessary, and I want to call their attention to the absolute necessity of this amendment, unless their exemption is to be a fraud and a sham. I want to say frankly that I do not think the committee intend that exemption to be a fraud and a sham.

When I was on the Immigration Commission a part of my duty was to study the way in which tickets were sold to immigrants. For various reasons I was the only member of the committee who came up through Calabria and traveled through Roumania and went into the question of ticket selling in Russia. I know just how these tickets are sold. If this fine fell on the steamship company, that would be one proposition; but these tickets are sold by little agents back in the interior of the country, and here is what is going to happen: A woman will come to one of these little agents in Russia, in Kiev, and say, "I want a ticket to America." He will say, "Can you read?" She will say: "No; I can't read, but my husband is in America, and under the American law I have a right to be admitted there, because I am his wife." The agent will say to her: "Look what a chance I am taking. The American law says that I can not take any security from you. I must take the chance that you are this man's wife; I must take the chance that you will not sell the ticket to somebody else; and if it turns out that you are deceiving me, or that your husband is dead, or will not receive you, or anything of that sort, I will have to pay you back your transportation money, the steamship company will have to bring you clear back from New York to Russia, and in addition to that I will have to pay the sum of $200."

No agent is going to take such a chance as that. If it was not for the provision later on in the bill, preventing the agent from taking security, he would do that ordinary business thing. He would say: "Very well, put up security against this fine and against these penalties." But he is prohibited from doing that; and although I know the committee do not intend it, this simply means that no ticket will be sold to any person abroad who can not read. Now, there is a plain, simple statement of a business fact that ought to appeal to every business man on this floor. If you want your exemption to work, strike out these words. An agent can tell whether a man is a Japanese or a Chinaman, so as to come under the other provisions. A surgeon can tell whether a man is more or less afflicted; but nobody can tell to a certainty whether a person who can not read will be adjudged to come within some of the exceptions to section 3.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York professes to be very solicitious for the welfare of the immigrant. This provision in the bill which he seeks to strike out is one of the most valuable provisions in the bill. It is intended to prevent the steamship companies bringing aliens to the country who would not be admissible. The language can not be made plainer, and I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, can we have the amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 18, line 24, strike out the words "because unable to read or."

Mr. BENNET. So it will read:

Any aliens who are excluded by the provisions of section 3 of this act who are Hindus—

And so forth.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. BENNET) there were 3 ayes and 39 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, line 22, after the word "addition," insert the words "whenever the Secretary of Labor shall so direct."

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I am quite sure that the committee does not want to be unfair as between transportation companies and penalize countries that have adopted good laws. The best immigration laws in the world are the laws of the Italian Government, and those laws require and have required for years a good deal of what is in this section. I was not sure but that the law might have been repealed, so I wrote to the Italian embassy in the city and got this reply:

REGIA AMBASCIATA D'ITALIA,
Washington, February 11, 1916.

DEAR SIR: With reference to your inquiry of the 2d instant, I beg to inform you that the Italian law of emigration provides in a general way that the steamship companies must take emigrants excluded from a foreign country back to an Italian port free of charge. The companies are further liable for damages to the emigrant if it is proved that they were aware of the circumstances which would cause his rejection before leaving the port of departure.

Very truly, yours,

MACCHI DI CELLERE,
Royal Italian Ambassador.

Hon. WILLIAM S. BENNET,
United States Representative, Washington, D. C.

Unless this language I have suggested is put in, which leaves it discretionary with the Secretary, here will be the situation. The English and the Germans have not done a thing by law for the people who leave their country. The Italians have, and yet you treat them all alike, and you pile onto the Italian steamship line whose Government has already acted the same fine that you put on the Germans and the English which have not done a thing.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman knows that I am in favor of any amendment that would aid the immigrant, but I can not understand how his amendment would help, because if the Italian Government has such stringent laws the Italian companies could not violate this provision, and consequently they will not be subject to any of the fines.

Mr. BENNET. The question whether they violate the laws are passed upon by our officials, and properly so. The steamship companies claim that they do not violate the laws, while our officials claim that they do. What happens when an immigrant is sent back is this: If an Italian is brought back he can bring suit in an Italian court not only for the money paid but for his loss of time, and the court invariably gives him judgment not only for the money but for the loss of time at the rate of 2 liras a day, or about 40 cents. My opinion is that when a country has passed good laws for the protection of immigrants we ought to recognize that fact and put in the hands of the Secretary of Labor the power not to impose those penalties where the penalty is already being imposed by the law of the country from which the steamship comes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 19, line 8, after the word "addition" insert the words "whenever the Secretary of Labor shall so direct."

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all debate on the section under consideration, and all amendments thereto, close at the expiration of five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I will ask unanimous consent that a similar amendment may be read from the desk and deemed to be pending before I take my five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 18, line 16, after the word "addition" insert the words "whenever the Secretary of Labor shall so direct."

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to take the five minutes, and I will simply content myself with saying that the same reasons which applied to the other amendment apply to this, and, in my judgment, reiterated after 10 years of experience, where foreign countries that are bringing residents to our country who are to be, first, residents and then citizens are enacting laws to protect the citizens brought here by the steamship companies, we ought not to discriminate against them and put on double penalties. I ask unanimous consent that a vote be taken on both amendments at once.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the two amendments offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendments were rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That it shall be the duty of every person, including owners, officers, and agents of vessels or transportation lines, or international bridges or toll roads other than railway lines, which may enter into a contract as provided in section 23 of this act, bringing an alien to, or providing a means for an alien to come to, any seaport or land border port of the United States, to prevent the landing of such alien in the United States at any time or place other than as designated by the immigration officers, and the failure of any such person, owner, officer, or agent to comply with the foregoing requirements shall be deemed a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine in each case of not less than $200 nor more than $1,000, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment; or, if in the opinion of the Secretary of Labor it is impracticable or inconvenient to prosecute the person, owner, master, officer, or agent of any such vessel, a penalty of $1,000 shall be a lien upon the vessel whose owner, master, officer, or agent violates the provisions of this section, and such vessel shall be libeled therefor in the appropriate United States court.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, my attention has just been called to a speech on "Immigration" printed in the RECORD of Saturday, March 25, by the Hon. JOHN H. STEPHENS, of Texas. No word of this speech was delivered on the floor of this House, but the gentleman, taking advantage of the privilege granted to him by the House to extend his remarks, has seen fit to refer to my activity in the last Congress against the passage of this bill and in favor of sustaining the veto of President Wilson when this House was called upon to consider the President's message. His insinuations as to the reasons for my support of the veto, and his quotations from an alleged Washington newspaper with reference to myself, I shall ignore as unworthy of even passing notice. I have always been proud of the small part I played in helping to sustain President Wilson's decision, and I fervently hope that the opportunity may come for similar action at some future time.

Every man within the sound of my voice knows I am unalterably opposed to the Burnett bill, and I think I have expressed that opposition in a decent, honorable, manly way, without any reflection upon or impeachment of the motives of the honorable gentlemen who support it. For this reason I can not ignore one statement made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] in the extension of his remarks, which reads as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Bible tells us that a man can not serve two masters, and human experience abundantly sustains this doctrine; therefore there can be no English, German, Irish, or Catholic American, because a man can not serve two masters; if they are Americans, they can not be a German, Britisher, or Irishman. I regret to state that many men who have taken the oath of allegiance to the United States, thereby renouncing their allegiance to any foreign prince, potentate, or power, have, since the beginning of the present great European war, forgotten their oaths and are now boldly taking the side of their relatives by blood, and have also boldly criticized our Congress and our President, thereby rocking our ship of state, making it much harder for our good and great President to steer clear of all foreign complications that might lead our country into war, which God forbid.

This is a specific charge that an Englishman can not become a loyal American citizen; that a German can not become a loyal American citizen, and last, but not least, that an Irishman can not be a loyal American citizen. There would be glory enough for one speech if the statement stopped with this comprehensive denunciation, but it did not. Aroused to the highest pitch of patriotism and probably with the intention to do a lasting service to humanity and to set forth the ideals of Texas in their true light, the orator in writing his speeeh took pains to say that there could be no Catholic American.

This exalted and statesmanlike strain comes from the Representative of the thirteenth district of Texas, which he would have us know is the cradle of loyalty and the shrine of patriotism.

No immigrant can be a patriot, eh? How marvelous are the miracles wrought by time! Cooke County and the celebrated town of Gainesville, the seat of Cooke County, are located in that illimitable region of light called Texas and in the bosom of the thirteenth district, whence comes these burning words. Yes; time is not only a healer of wounds but in its vicissitudes it can breed patriotism where there was treason, civilization where there was savagery, light where there was darkness, learning where there was ignorance, and security where there was ruthless and wholesale murder.

When the State of Texas undertook to make itself a part of a foreign nation which, if it had succeeded, would have deprived us of the services of the gentleman from Texas, and after this attempt to make aliens of the third part of the American people had been in progress for some time, and the tragic year of 1862 arrived, a series of events occurred at Gainesville, Tex., that appear as a blot of darker infamy on the darkest page of the history of crime.

There were a number of men in Cooke County and adjoining counties in Texas who had in their hearts a veneration for the American flag. It was only 17 years since they proudly brought the State of Texas into the Union and it was a proud day in their lives when the Stars and Stripes first floated over the broad prairies of Texas as a part of the United States. Some of them banded themselves together to prevent their being drafted into the Confederate Army. They made no riot; they did not kill anyone; they committed no crime at all except what was then the most horrible offense imaginable in what is now the distinguished gentleman's district—they objected to being dragged from their homes and compelled to fire on the flag of their country.

Now, if I had the narrow-minded prejudices of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] when he discusses immigration, I would probably proceed to quote from rumors or from cheap weekly newspapers published in backwoods towns to substantiate what I shall say took place in this sanctuary of loyalty described as the thirteenth district of Texas. I shall set it forth as a contrast to the genuine patriotism of our immigrant children as proven on a hundred battle fields.

I shall not consult my feelings as the gentleman from Texas consulted his. I shall not speak in any spirit of hatred as did the gentleman who quoted the Book that commands us to love one another. But this occasion should not pass without reminding the gentleman from Texas of how patriotism and loyalty had their birth where he has been honored most.

In October, 1862, 42 white citizens of the United States, nearly all farmers, without trial, without process of law and solely on suspicion of their being banded together to restore the Union and the Constitution in Texas, and to refuse to be compelled to do the work of treason on the battle field and shoot down their fellow citizens and perhaps their kindreds who were fighting in defense of their country, were put to death under circumstances of such stony-hearted barbarity as would cause Pancho Villa to turn away in horror.

There is an elm tree in Cambridge, Mass., a city so ably represented here by my worthy colleague Mr. DALLINGER, under which Washington drew the sword of liberty; there was the Charter Oak at Hartford, whose every leaf was a witness of the American spirit of independence. There is an elm in the yard of the Capitol said to have been planted by Washington, and the most beautiful tree in this city is another elm in the Capitol Grounds planted by the hands of Charles Sumner, but there was an elm tree in Gainesville on which 40 citizens were strangled to death for their loyalty to the flag of their country. The other two brave hearts broke away from the guards on the way to execution and were mercilessly shot down.

There was a citizen of Gainesville, Dr. Thomas Barett, a minister of the gospel as well as a physician, who went through the terrible experience of serving on a mock jury which was appointed by a committee of a mob and felt itself authorized to condemn to death any man connected with this loyal organization by a majority vote. The doctor wrote an account of the murders in 1885, which was published in pamphlet form and is found in the Library of Congress. And here I pause to say that it is the only literary production from that distinguished district that appears to be found in the Library, a district whose Representative pleads for the literacy test. And I further say that while I have been more or less familiar with books, I would be amazed to learn of any book written in Texas that is well known among the people of the United States. What book was written there? Will any gentleman tell me? What invention to lift from the shoulders of labor the burden of toil and to help to feed a hungry world was ever invented in Texas? What lasting monument of genius bears witness to the intellectual toil of Texas? What work of art hangs in any gallery that was penciled there? What statue was ever sculptured to plead to posterity for the remembrance of the great by any citizen of that grassy expanse that geographers call Texas? It was hoped that the liberation of the slaves would glorify and exalt the minds of men in that region of the lash and the auction block; but the hopes were disappointed, for the minds of men were on the contrary enslaved and, politically at least, there can be but one expression of thought in an empire whose 265,000 square miles are a source of pride to its inhabitants, as if they had filled an ocean and created Texas—Texas, that wants no immigrants.

But coming back to Dr. Barrett. He wrote a pamphlet, the sincerity of which is marked by the simplicity of its style. Perhaps he tempered his language to fit the understanding of his patriotic neighbors. He begins the narrative of the appalling murders with this gentle apology:

> The war between the States, North and South, have existed more than a year, the war fever having risen to boiling heat, the Confederate Congress passed the conscript law. This law was very offensive to many, and particularly to those who were afterwards members of the organization for which they were hung.

The doctor then goes on to say that one man, who afterwards disappeared, threatened to raise a company to resist conscription for the Confederate Army. But there was a mysterious initiator, as the learned doctor calls him, who initiated men into the organization. Finally some one notified the military authorities of the Confederacy; all the militia was called out and a great number of arrests were made, including about 150 farmers of the county, and the prisoners were brought to Gainesville and crowded into the county jail.

When I arrived near town—

Says the doctor—

> there were crowds in sight in every direction, armed and pressing forward prisoners under guard. The deepest and most intense excitement that I ever saw prevailed. Reason had left its throne. * * * Soon after I arrived on the square I heard hanging spoken of. I found the tree had been selected, that same old historic elm, with its long and bending limbs, which was afterwards used for that purpose. The crowd seemed to be settling down on beginning to hang—

Says the narrator, with easy familiarity with scenes of death.

Then he goes on to say that a meeting was called and a chairman appointed, and "a motion was made and carried for the Chair to appoint five men to select a jury to decide upon a course to be pursued with these men." Dr. Barrett reluctantly accepted an appointment as a juror. "The jury met and passed an order that a majority should rule." This, of course, was in accordance with Gainesville democracy. Then, in accordance with what they conceived to be the privileges of the Magna Charta, they proceeded to try the prisoners. A fact came out in the testimony that caused a shudder throughout that whole region.

"The Confederate Government had a large amount of ammunition at Sherman, which was guarded day and night. Cooke County had about 400 pounds of powder and other ammunition to suit it. Their plans were to rise in the night and take all the ammunition at Sherman and Gainesville and leave the county without ammunition, and take the county."

The precious material with which the flag of our country was to be riddled was in danger of being monopolized by those treacherous conspirators. It was darkly hinted, as the painstaking doctor narrates, that it was their purpose to join Gen. Blount's division of the Union Army. It was soon circulated about the town that it was the purpose of these men to rise in the night and murder their neighbors, especially including women and children. This is the kind of plot that always haunts the midnight hours of a true and genuine patriot. There used to be a great many people in this country who were even more patriotic than the gentleman from Texas who were grievously disappointed because some wholesale murder had not taken place in the night. They were dishonored as prophets among their compatriots, and their want of accurate information as to the date of the massacre was a subject of comment among their friends that was very painful to them. The pious doctor does not fail to state that the extermination of the loyal Confederates of Cooke County and adjoining counties was providentially prevented by a heavy rain. The painstaking jury soon discovered that "the night of the big rain" was the night that was set for the slaughter of the innocents.

And now the doctor, with the simplicity of a prophet, quietly recites what took place in the jury room:

> One man, known to be a leader, was brought in and proven to be guilty, he being the man who initiated the two men who had been initiated and reported to the military. This man was condemned and hung; another was brought and was disposed of in the same way, and this was continued until seven were doomed to die likewise.

It seems as though the jury was not doing business with the necessary dispatch, and—> to take the prisoners out and kill all of them. There was a trial made to have me taken off the jury because I took the lead in opposing these violent measures. We who opposed hanging insisted to turn the men over to the civil or military authorities instead of hanging.

> The crowd were threatening—

At this juncture the jury made a mistake. They tried and condemned the eighth man, but "he was only slightly in it," and Dr. Barrett made a plea in his behalf. He sets out his humane speech to the jury with a dramatic precision that seems to indicate that he had read Homer. He threatened to leave the jury, but was persuaded by some of his friends to remain and have at least a few more men hanged to prevent the lynching of all the prisoners. So he decided to continue as a juror in the interests of humanity and hang a few more.

Lest this might seem incredible, I insert the words of the devout physician who was compelled to admit that it was fitting that certain of the prisoners "should die for the people":

> The excitement had reached the jury room. I and a few others saw the situation at once. The testimony against the men on which they had been tried was all written down, consequently there was nothing to be done but read it and take the vote. One was put on trial, the vote taken, and he condemned to hang; a second was disposed of in the same manner. I made a trial to stop the course of things, but I saw that it was useless to make any attempt to save the men by a vote. I then proposed a compromise; I proposed to allow them to select six of the worst ones and hang them, and set the rest at liberty. I saw they were going to hang a good many more than that, and I was striving to save as many as possible, but the jury rejected my proposition. When they rejected it, hope fled, and I took my seat to watch the course of events. I sat sad and silent till six were condemned and not one set at liberty, for it was "hang or set at liberty." The jury changed its rules and granted a new trial to the eighth prisoner on the two-thirds plan.

Having the benefit of this rule, number eight was not immediately hanged but was turned over to the military authorities.

For several days after this the jury seemed to hesitate at further convictions. This resulted in nightly attempts to lynch all the remaining prisoners, which was prevented by a heroic jailer whose name the cautious and circumspect doctor apparently for reasons best known to himself, fails to mention, even 23 years after the fact. Saturday night came and, the jury being disinclined to work on the Sabbath, took a vote and decided what to do with the balance of the prisoners and adjourned until the next Saturday, agreeing to keep their decision secret until that time. Then they went home. The secret which the doctor fails to divulge in his narrative "leaked," as he said, during the night and there was general dissatisfaction expressed with the wholly inadequate administration of justice by the 12 good men and true. No doubt there was then, as now, a large contingent of patriots in Gainesville who were deeply interested in the administration of justice.

A glorious Sabbath morning in October came for the worship of God and for the inculcation of the doctrine of loving thy neighbor as thyself, a doctrine which the average immigrant never forgets. The sun mounted the heavens and a procession was seen moving toward the elm tree in the square. It was headed by a wagonload of men who loved their country better than they did Cooke County, Tex., flanked by files of soldiers. The tender-hearted doctor did not wish to be present at the strangling of these men. "I took my seat in a porch at the northeast corner of the square, where I knew that the men would be hauled in a wagon down California Street. * * * I had not been there long till I saw the death wagon coming with two of the prisoners * * * and this was continued until late in the evening before the last one was hung." Dr. Barrett goes on to say that he asked why the military authorities had taken the men from the jury, contrary to what they had decided to do, and to the day that he wrote his narrative he was never able to find out. Fourteen men were martyred on the elm tree that day. They were all heads of families and all had children but one, according to Dr. Barrett.

There was a sense of propriety in that portion of Texas then superior to what seems to be the case now. "There was an order passed that women should not be permitted to be present at the hanging," writes Dr. Barrett, but Texas has fallen from her high estate, for a few weeks ago we read of a man being roasted alive in the presence of women and children in that State, where formerly there would be none but an exclusive and limited audience admitted to the spectacle.

It was hoped by the humane part of the community that this holocaust of 21 lives would suffice to vindicate the insulted patriotism of Gainesville, but during the week two terrible things happened in the county. Two men who had been vindictively hostile to the prisoners were shot down in the chapparal that fringes the Red River. One of them was pursuing his accustomed sport of deer hunting during the saturnalia of death. No one up to the date of Dr. Barrett's history ever found out who had killed them. Of course none of the prisoners had any share in the murders. They were closely guarded many miles from the scene. But such was the condition of the public mind in and about Gainesville that the prisoners were held accountable for the murders, and the people demanded that they should suffer death for the crimes of those who the public believed were their friends. Probably this was the time when the glowing patriotism of Gainesville had its birth.

In fact, the strain was so great at that time in what is now the thirteenth district of Texas that men seemed to prefer to be hanged rather than endure it. The pious historian of Gainesville does not fail to put this paragraph in his account of the suppression of loyalty:

> Here I must state that all the time that this thing was going on occasionally men who were in this clan were coming in and surrendering, and some of them had been hung.

Saturday came and the jury, having rested, reassembled. While Dr. Barrett does not say so, it seems plain from his account that the horrible secret that they nursed in their breasts during the whole week was that they intended to advise the release of all the prisoners when they next met, hoping in the meantime that local patriotism would sufficiently subside to allow them to exercise this much humanity. But when they came together the public demand for vicarious atonement for the death of the two citizens was overwhelming.

> A man who was very active against those men came into the jury room and told us he had a proposition to make. He was told to make it. He referred to a man who was prominent among the prisoners, observing that if there was anything kept back this man knew it. He proposed to the jury to bring him and tell him if he would reveal everything that the jury would release him, and for us to release him according to promise, and he would attend to him before he got home.

Due to the efforts of Dr. Barrett and what might be called the everlasting honor of the remainder of the jury this offer of disinterested public service was solemnly declined.

Another Sabbath sun rose on Gainesville and cast the long shadow of the elm tree on the town. The Sabbath was again remembered, if not kept holy, at the northern limit of Texas. The old woman who was knitting in Dickens's Tale of Two Cities would have left her seat near the guillotine to witness the scene of that Sabbath day in Gainesville. Dr. Barrett is at his best when he comes to describe what happened on this day:

> But that dreadful Sunday dawned and I went to Gainesville not to see the men hung, for I would not see any of those men hung; but I went to see how things which were going on would terminate. I took my seat in the same porch at the northeast corner of the square, where I sat when the 14 men passed which the mob took from the jury and hung.
> The hanging did not commence very early, and when the last one was hung the sun was low. * * *
> There were 40 hung and 2 who broke from the guard were shot and killed, making 42 deaths.

And every face that was distorted in death beneath that elm tree was the face of a White American citizen, an American perhaps whose lineage dated back to the founders of the Republic, the very kind of citizen for whose protection and welfare the gentleman from Texas has made an asault on other citizens on account of the accident of their birth or the manner in which they worship God.

The doctor then mercifully shifts the scene to the close of the Civil War and with the utmost innocence describes the coming of the United States forces:

> The Federal soldiers came in, and such running and taking to the brush had never been in Cooke County; not only the jury, but a good many others who had taken an active part in the hanging.

This should be described in the history of Gainesville as the "Hegira of the patriots."

Under the law of the United States every man who willfully had taken part in this wholesale murder could have been regularly tried by court-martial and hanged according to law. An order was issued preventing the military trial of those men. If they had been hunted down and regularly tried and hanged, there would even be more patriotism in the thirteenth district of Texas to-day than there is now.

Mr. Chairman, I make this assertion boldly that owing to the very fact that the North had a cosmopolitan population which although united in devotion to the Union it could not be united in any plan or policy to wreak vengeance on the fallen South. If they were a homogeneous population and if they were all of that noble stock represented by the gentleman from Texas, they would have parceled out the South, and especially Texas, among the victorious soldiers in the good old Anglo-Saxon way. If this happened, the gentleman probably would not be here. Being a man of evident piety, every time he looks about on the fair and limitless patrimony of Texas he ought most devoutly to thank his Maker that the loyal people of the United States were not all like him. I do not dislike him personally. He is a good man for Gainesville, giving expression to the philosophy of the region in which he lives and the light in which it is studied. He probably desires to advertise Texas at the expense of the immigrant, and if this is his purpose I shall help him. Oh, yes; I like him, but I do not like his exclusive and narrow-minded doctrine. If I had the vocabulary of that other distinguished gentleman, who fittingly represents the whole State of Texas as a Congressman at large, I mean Mr. DAVIS, inadequately called "Cyclone" DAVIS, I would pay my respects to the sentiments expressed by the gentleman from the thirteenth district of the celebrated Lone Star State. If it is a fact that Texas has a horror of the immigrant, it is fitting and proper that the gentleman from Texas should do his best to cause the immigrant to have a horror of Texas. If this is an acceptable public service in that State, he has certainly rendered it with a degree of effectiveness and ability rarely ever performed through the medium of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. Chairman, I also have a notion of what the duty of the public ought to be. I believe that a monument ought to be erected by the Government to commemorate those 42 martyrs who suffered death primarily for their devotion to the Government of the United States, and it is my present purpose to introduce a bill to erect a shaft that will plead to posterity for their remembrance. They did not die in vain! These men would not have barred the worthy immigrant from our shores, and the immigrant children of this glorious Republic in this day and hour breathe a prayer for their everlasting repose.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of calling the attention of the chairman of the committee to an omission, or to, rather, a misplaced punctuation mark occurring on lines 23, 24, and 25, on page 19. As the bill reads it says:

> SEC. 10. That it shall be the duty of every person, including owners, officers, and agents of vessels or transportation lines, or international bridges or toll roads other than railway lines, which may enter into a contract as provided in section 23 of this act, bringing an alien to—

In the law as it is at present there is no comma after the words "railway lines" in line 24, and the result is that unless the gentleman omits the provision the section will apply only, and this is a penal section——

Mr. BURNETT rose.

Mr. BENNET. Does the gentleman see the point?

Mr. BURNETT. In other words, the gentleman desires to strike out the comma after the word "lines"?

Mr. BENNET. Yes; and if I were drafting the section I think I would go even to the extent of putting the words "other than railway lines which may enter into a contract as provided in section 23 of this act" in parentheses, this being a penal statute.

Mr. BURNETT. Oh, I think the comma at the end will make it a parenthetical statement.

Mr. BENNET. Will the gentleman offer the amendment? He seems to have better success with amendments than I do.

Mr. BURNETT. I will accept the amendment of the gentleman striking out the comma after the word "lines" in line 24. The gentleman is right for once.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I offer that amendment on page 19, line 24.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 19, line 24, strike out the comma after the word "lines."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, the insertion of this word simply continues the existing law. The gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] asked me a few moments ago if you could punish a man criminally for an act done without intent. I answer him in the words of his bill, that it is purposed here to do precisely that thing. If a conductor upon a railroad which has not made the contract, or the keeper of an international bridge, permits, without negligence, an alien to get off his railroad car or a bridge at some point other than designated by the immigration officials, he is guilty of a misdemeanor, although the alien may have knocked him down or clubbed him or gotten away and across the line, and particularly in the case of the railroad which crosses the line at some place other than the place designated. Yet that man who had been pounded, who had been assaulted, could be brought up in the United States court, tried for a misdemeanor, and, worse, if he be convicted the minimum penalty is mandatory and he could not be fined less than $200.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Is it not true that there is an administrative penalty at the end of the section that grants an alternative?

Mr. BENNET. Where?

Mr. GARDNER. Section 10, that the gentleman is reading from.

Mr. BENNET. No, sir; that applies only to steamships. I am talking about railroad lines.

Mr. GARDNER. Where does the gentleman's amendment come in?

Mr. BENNET. Line 4, page 20, in front of the word "negligence."

Mr. GARDNER. There surely is at the end of section 10, "or if in the opinion of the Secretary of Labor it is impracticable or inconvenient to prosecute the person, owner, master, officer"——

Mr. BENNET. Yes; such "vessel." Why, Mr. Chairman, this is just another instance of the fact that gentlemen ought to have the right, without being criticized, to get up here and attempt to perfect this bill. The gentleman from Massachusetts knows this immigration law and he sees the defect instantly.

Mr. GARDNER. No; I am not sure at all.

Mr. BENNET. Of course, he does. A railroad train is not a vessel. The gentleman is no lawyer, but he has good, hard common sense. No; this is not a comma business, either. We have put one penalty on a conductor or trainman of a railroad and another for the steamship man, and if he thinks he has a valid excuse, why the Secretary of Commerce will let him off or give another penalty, which penalty is on the vessel, but if a brakeman on a railroad happens to let an immigrant escape he must go into court and be fined not less than $200.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I did not quite understand what the gentleman stated about this being a continuation of the law at the present time.

Mr. BENNET. This amendment I have offered is simply to continue existing law.

Mr. GARDNER. The word "negligent"——

Mr. BENNET. Is in the existing law. Now, it is proposed to strike out and provide when a man has an accident and by reason of that accident, when he acted in the utmost good faith—and I would like to get the attention of the lawyers, if not on the other side, on this side—as to whether they are going——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BENNET. I ask for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BENNET. As to whether they are going to vote to make a man guilty of a misdemeanor and punishable by a minimum fine—the maximum fine is $1,000—of $200 for doing an act without any intention of doing wrong.

Mr. MANN. And over which he may have no control.

Mr. BENNET. And over which he may have no control.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I am not prepared to say that there might not be an amendment necessary at the end of that section, but to insert once more the word "negligent"——

Mr. BENNET. To continue it.

Mr. GARDNER. To continue the existing law, which has the word "negligent" inserted before the word "failure," would be a great mistake. I want to read from the report of the Commissioner General of Immigration in 1911. In 1911 the Commissioner General of Immigration submitted to us the draft of a new immigration law. The wording of section 34 of that draft law has been adopted in a modified form in section 10 of this bill. The wording submitted at that time by the Commissioner General of Immigration made it the "mandatory and unqualified duty of every person, including owners, officers," and so forth, to prevent the escape of persons who had no right to land in this country. The Committee on Immigration two or three years ago—I have forgotten exactly when—came to the conclusion that this "mandatory and unqualified" provision recommended by the Commissioner of Immigration ought not to be adopted, and yet that steps must be taken to prevent beyond peradventure the landing in this country of unauthorized persons. Consequently it was decided to omit the word "negligent" before the word "failure." I am going to read from the report submitted by the Commissioner General of Immigration in 1911. At that time he submitted to Congress the draft of a new immigration bill. Section 34 of the commissioner's bill is very like section 10 of this bill which we are considering and substantially the same as section 18 of the act of 1907, which endeavors to guard against the unauthorized landing of immigrants. Section 18 of existing law, the act of 1907, carries the word "negligent" before the word "failure." Here is what the commissioner says in this connection:

Section 34 is section 18 of the act of 1907 materially strengthened. And it needs to be so strengthened, for various decisions by the courts, especially one by the Supreme Court (197 U. S., 442), under the rules of strict construction observed in criminal and penal matters, have almost destroyed this important requirement, particularly in the case of Chinese seamen and other alien seamen diseased, or criminal, or otherwise disqualified, whose cases are also covered in an alternative way by the succeeding two sections.

And then he goes on to explain the necessity of strengthening the law. That is what the committee tried to do by omitting the word "negligent," and I believe that the committee accomplished its purpose. The word "negligent" was omitted in the bill vetoed by President Wilson, and I think also in the bill vetoed by President Taft as well. I am not at all sure but that the gentleman from New York is quite right in calling attention to the fact that the administrative penalty provided at the end of section 10 does not cover cases of railroad transportation. As to the amendment which the gentleman actually offered, I am opposed to it.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended three minutes, so I may ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has not expired.

Mr. BENNET. I beg pardon, I will ask the question then. Is the gentleman aware when the bill passed this last year that it had the word "person"——

Mr. GARDNER. What word "person"; in what part of that section?

Mr. BENNET. Line 5.

Mr. GARDNER. Just read the connecting words, please.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HAY). Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARDNER. It says that it shall be the duty of every person——

Mr. BENNET. It was there, but it was not in line 5.

Mr. GARDNER. As the bill passed the House last year, it read this way:

That it shall be the mandatory and unqualified duty of every person, including owners——

Mr. BENNET. Yes; but read on in line 5.

Mr. GARDNER. It says—

Officers, and agents of vessels of transportation lines (other than those lines which may enter into a contract, as provided in sec. 23 of this act) bringing an alien to any seaport or land border port.

Mr. BENNET. Of course, the words "or providing means for an alien to come" are added. But, after the words "negligent failure," it is now "of any such person." Last year it was not, I am informed.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman is mistaken, I think.

Mr. MANN. The word "person" was not in.

Mr. BENNET. I would like to ask the gentleman what amendment he would suggest at the end of section 10, that he thinks——

Mr. GARDNER. I do not know. I have not given it any thought, and, not being a lawyer, I can not construct amendments offhand. But I can see the point the gentleman raises, and, so far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing to listen to anything the gentleman has to say if he has an amendment. But meanwhile I think we had better dispose of his first amendment, which is actually pending.

Mr. BURNETT. The word "negligent" was left out on the suggestion of the department, because if left in there it devolved upon the department first to prove that the transportation company was negligent, and the Chinese and others that were coming in in violation of law were escaping because the Government was not able to prove that the steamship was negligent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. BURNETT. I did not know that I was speaking in the gentleman's time.

It strikes me, Mr. Chairman, the case the gentleman speaks of is not failure—not any kind of failure. I do not believe that any court would ever charge a jury that where a railroad conductor or somebody had been knocked down and prevented by some kind of force, whether actual or constructive, that that was a failure; where it was prevented from being done. You see the danger of leaving "negligent" in there as the law did before. It was stricken out intentionally for the purpose of preventing that kind of failure of justice—the escape of the Chinese that were coming in in violation of the Chinese-exclusion law.

I am informed by an agent of the department that there are very few of these that ever come in, so far as railroad companies are concerned, and this proposition is leveled at the steamship companies; that they are the ones that often bring in these people, and if the Government has to prove it is negligently done, it puts on the Government a burden it will be hard to carry. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET].

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that it may again be reported.

The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from New York, but I also see much force in the suggestion made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT]. It seems to me that what we ought to do is to afterwards return to this section in order that an amendment may be provided which in some way would reach the transportation companies—that is, to add to the proviso or exceptions in the latter part of the clause some sort of a provision that would reach the transportation companies. Then I think we would have the section in the form in which it ought to be.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BENNET. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 4, noes 28.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. BENNET. Before we get off this section, I was going to suggest to the gentleman from Alabama, in view of the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from Iowa, and the further apparent discrimination in the last proviso, whether he would not pass this section over, so that an amendment could be reached which would cover transportation companies as well as steamship companies?

Mr. BURNETT. They are covered by the paragraph in the first part of the section, and it would be utterly impracticable, it seems to me, to apply the same law to a railroad as it would to steamship companies. It is impracticable to have it otherwise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 20, after line 16, insert as a separate section the following:

"That when any country, by order or otherwise, excludes from entering their territory certain classes of the citizens of the United States the same classes of citizens from such country are hereby prohibited from entering the United States."

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I want to take occasion to call the attention of the committee to a situation that exists in the Pacific northwest that has recently been brought to my attention.

By an order in council certain classes of American citizens are prohibited from entering British Columbia. That order in council was issued as of date of Thursday, September 30, 1915. By this order in council, I say, issued on Thursday, September 30, 1915, certain classes of people from this country and all other countries were prohibited from entering certain ports in Canada. I will read from that order:

Artisans, laborers, skilled and unskilled, shall be and the same are hereby prohibited.

And then it names the ports, which includes all the ports of British Columbia.

Now, the result of that policy has been that a great many laborers of British Columbia have come down into the State of Washington, and then they are not permitted to return to British Columbia. Not only do they prohibit their own people from returning to British Columbia, but they do not permit Americans of any of these classes I have named to go into British Columbia

Only a few days ago I received a telegram in the case of a young man by the name of John Peirce Moller, who was in the employ of the Ford Automobile Co., who went over there last June. He was a skilled laborer. He had charge of one of the shops or one of their salesrooms—I do not know which. Last February he visited his home near Seattle, and when he attempted to return he was prohibited from entering under the order just read. It was stated by an official that he would have been deported anyway.

The present condition is a great hardship on the people of our State, and I want to read a resolution passed by the State Federation of Labor at North Yakima, Wash., January 19, 1916. I read:

Resolution by Delegate E. P. Marsh, Typographical Union 410, Everett, Wash.—Referred to committee on resolutions.

Whereas the continued depression in industry and employment in the State of Washington demands remedy, and it is apparent that such remedy must begin by a more vigorous and effective enforcement of United States Immigration laws to prevent entry of foreign unemployed, European and Chinese, from British Columbia; and

Whereas such entries of unemployed from Canada, Chinese and Europeans, amounted to many thousands during the past year, as evidenced by more than 2,000 arrests of such foreigners by the limited force of immigration officers now maintained; and

Whereas the force of United States immigration inspectors in the State of Washington has been heavily reduced and offices closed, until there are now fewer officers on duty than there were eight years ago; and

Whereas figures of the United States Treasury show a balance of immigrant head-tax collections over expenditures for enforcing immigration laws during the past 15 years of more than $10,000,000; and

Whereas practically the entire land and water boundary of the State of Washington are left open to the entry of foreigners from Canada because of the parsimonious attitude of the Federal Government, resulting in the coming of a foreign horde of pauper unemployed, throwing out of employment thousands of American workmen in Washington, Oregon, and California and reducing wages below the point of a bare existence: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we call upon our Senators and Representatives in Congress to demand that the money collected for immigrant head tax be expended in enforcing the immigration and Chinese-exclusion laws, and that the force of immigrant inspectors in the State of Washington be at once increased; that such inspectors be supplied with proper means of running down, detecting, and preventing smugglers from operating; and that American labor be given the protection from foreign pauper competition that it has the right to expect.

Passed at annual convention, State Federation of Labor, North Yakima, Wash., January 19, 1916.

Last winter, according to information I have received from a letter the secretary of the Washington State Federation of Labor wrote to the Secretary of Labor, 63 per cent of the people who applied for charity in the city of Seattle were foreigners, and a majority of them came, as they believe, from British Columbia. I do not believe that we ought to permit British Columbia to make this country a dumping ground for her laborers.

Mr. BURNETT. Were those that came in Canadians or people from all the countries of the world?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. They were, as I understand it, people from all the countries of the world who had gone to British Columbia and then want to come down to this country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GARDNER. Can the gentleman from Washington explain why it is that they close the stations in British Columbia to those returning artisans and do not close places of entry in any other part of the Dominion of Canada?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I have no direct information as to why——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Just a moment. I have no direct information as to why that order is made to apply only to British Columbia, but I know that it does apply to that Province, because I have a copy of that order in my hand, and before this order was issued they largely followed that practice anyway. For the past two years there has been constant complaint from the people of my State, especially from the labor organizations, about this influx of foreign labor from British Columbia and their action in prohibiting their people from returning.

Mr. GARDNER. They can get in at Saskatchewan or Alberta and take the train?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The prohibition is by the Province itself.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; the gentleman is mistaken about that. This order was issued at Ottawa, but it applies only to British Columbia.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman read it?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I can read it, but it will take up all of my time. I will be glad to read it, however. I read:

[P. C. 2295. Privy Council, Canada.]

AT THE GOVERNMENT HOUSE AT OTTAWA,
Thursday, the 30th September, 1915.

Present: His royal highness, the Governor General, in council.

His Royal Highness the Governor General, by and with the advice of the King's Privy Council for Canada, under and by virtue of the provisions of subsection C of section 38 of the immigration act—9–10, Edward VII—and in view of the present overcrowded condition of the labor market in the Province of British Columbia, is pleased to order, and it is hereby ordered, as follows:

From and after 1st October, 1915, and until after the 31st day of March, 1916, the landing at any port of entry in British Columbia hereinafter specified of any immigrant of any of the following classes or occupations, viz, artisans, laborers, skilled and unskilled, shall be, and the same is hereby, prohibited.

The following ports of entry in British Columbia are hereby designated as the ports of entry at which this order shall apply:

Vancouver, Victoria, New Westminster, Nanaimo, Prince Rupert, Kamloops, Keremeos, Kingsgate, Ladner, Fort Simpson, Anyox, Atlin, Chilliwack, Bridesville, Midway, Steveston, Chemainus, Powell River, Chopaka, Carson, Cascade, Comox, Osoyoos, Rykerts, Rossland, Stewart, Union Bay, Ganges Harbor, Douglas, Gateway, Grand Forks, Huntingdon, Pacific Highway, White Rock, Mission Junction, Whales Island, Mynoaster, Ladysmith, Paterson, Aldergrove, Upper Sumas, Waneta, Newport, Alberni.

RUDOLPH BOUDREAU,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

This order expires within a few days, unless it has been reissued, and as to that I am not informed.

Mr. BURNETT. Is that order still in existence, or was it a temporary order?

Mr. HAYES. It expires on the 31st of this month.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes; it expires on the 31st of March, unless it has been reissued.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I received a copy of this order from Mr. Lansing, the Secretary of State. Now I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, this is a very important matter, and this is the first time it has been called to my attention. I am of the opinion that if it is agreed to the amendment should be redrafted. I therefore ask unanimous consent that without prejudice we be allowed to return to it later.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will be glad to do that, because I drew it hurriedly.

Mr. GARDNER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, it does not belong here anyway. This section refers to the inspection of immigrants on board ship.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] asks unanimous consent that the proposed amendment may be offered to some other portion of the bill, and without prejudice to offer the same.

Mr. MANN. He asks that it may be temporarily passed over, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; and that it may be temporarily passed over. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do that for the purpose of recurring to the amendment that was proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET]. I will consume less than one minute, so I hope nobody will object.

It did not occur to me at all that anybody would suppose I would attempt to put an amendment on the section just read for "libeling" any transportation company in the sense of a vessel. I know that can not be done. Any lawyer knows that it would be easy to draft an amendment that would apply the penalty to the transportation company itself, but not to an employee or the conductor of the train. It is evident that is what should be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That for the purpose of determining whether aliens arriving at ports of the United States belong to any of the classes excluded by this act, either by reason of being afflicted with any of the diseases or mental or physical defects or disabilities mentioned in section 3 hereof, or otherwise, or whenever the Secretary of Labor has received information showing that any aliens are coming from a country or have embarked at a place where any of said diseases are prevalent or epidemic, the Commissioner General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, may direct that such aliens shall be detained on board the vessel bringing them, or in a United States immigration station at the expense of such vessel, as circumstances may require or justify, a sufficient time to enable the immigration officers and medical officers stationed at such ports to subject such aliens to an observation and examination sufficient to determine whether or not they belong to the said excluded classes by reason of being afflicted in the manner indicated: Provided, That, with a view to avoid undue delay in landing passengers or interference with commerce, the Commissioner General of Immigration may, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, issue such regulations, not inconsistent with law, as may be deemed necessary to effect the purposes of this section: Provided further, That it shall be the duty of immigrant inspectors to report to the Commissioner General of Immigration the condition of all vessels bringing aliens to United States ports and whether such vessels conform in their arrangements to the requirements of the passenger act approved August 2, 1882, and amendments thereto, and the provisions of this section shall be excepted from that portion of section 38 of this act which provides that this act shall not be construed to repeal, alter, or amend section 6, chapter 453, third session, Fifty-eighth Congress, approved February 6, 1905, or the act approved August 2, 1882, entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers by sea," and amendments thereto.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I have a committee amendment which I wish to offer to the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers a committee amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment, page 21, line 21, change the comma to a period, and strike out all the rest of the section.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I favor this amendment; but before it passes I want to ask the chairman of the committee if he does not think the very laudable purpose he is attempting would be better served if he put the period after the word "port" in line 18, page 21, and struck out the rest of the section? Before he answers that question I will give him the reasons why I think it is so.

Section 11 of the passenger act of 1882 requires the collector of customs of the collection district within which a vessel comes to direct an inspector or other officer of the customs to make an examination of the vessel and to admeasure the compartments or spaces occupied by the immigrant passengers, or passengers other than cabin passengers during the voyage, and so forth. In other words, when a vessel comes into the port of Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, or New York, the customs inspector goes on board after the vessel has docked and measures the ship, and if the provisions in relation to the cubic space and the arrangements of berths, and everything of that kind, are not as required by law, then the vessel is fined. But there is one thing that the customs inspector does not do. He does not go on board the vessel until after the passengers are off, and therefore he is not able to certify as to the conditions of cleanliness and matters of that sort. This ought to be a practical bill; and in practice in the port of New York and also in the port of Philadelphia, and I do not know but in other ports, the immigrant inspectors go down the bay, get on the boat, and come up to the landing on the vessel. While they are looking over the emigrants they have time to do one other thing, and only one thing of value, and that is to see whether the vessel is cleanly kept, well kept, and whether conditions are such that human beings ought to be there. Now, if they could be given authority to report that, something worth while would be done; but, under this amendment, you are putting on them a duty that they can not ever perform.

The customs inspector can not take aboard a vessel carrying 1,200 people his measuring rod and his diagrams and measure the ship and see if it has the correct amount of cubic space that is required by section 1 of the passenger act. Therefore while by concentrating his attention the immigrant inspector might be required to do a useful thing, you are compelling him to certify whether such vessels conform in their arrangements to the requirements of the passenger act approved August 2, 1882, and amendments thereto. He does not know. He can not find out. It is not his business, and there is a danger about it. The customs inspector will say, "Well, the last voice of Congress is that the immigrant inspector shall do this. Heretofore I have been doing it; but if Congress wants the immigrant inspector to do it, let him do it." The immigrant inspector is not on the vessel at a time when he can do it, because as soon as the vessel docks he goes with the immigrants down to Ellis Island or the similar place at some other port.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I think there will be no trouble about our agreeing on this proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman ask to modify his amendment?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes. I have been informed that it would be practically impossible, so far as the inspectors are concerned, and that they would necessarily have to depend on the customs officers. Hence I think there will be no objection to putting the period after the word "port" and striking out all the rest of the section.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask a question of the gentleman from Alabama. Would not the immigration inspector have the right to accompany the revenue officer on the revenue cutter and meet the boat as the revenue officer does, and therefore would he not have an opportunity to ascertain the conditions before the immigrants are unloaded?

Mr. BURNETT. It would not be prevented.

Mr. BENNET. May I answer that question? It would not be prevented. He would have the right; but I think the gentleman from Alabama sees the point, and I think he is right in modifying his amendment as we propose doing.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment:
Page 21, line 18, insert a period after the word "port" and strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURNETT. Now, Mr. Chairman, while we are on this subject, I ask unanimous consent to turn to page 62 for the purpose of offering an amendment, in line 13, to strike out the word "or," and in line 14, preceding the word "the," to insert the words "nor to repeal, alter, or amend," and in line 16 change the colon to a comma and insert the words "except as provided in section 11 hereof." I ask unanimous consent to go over to page 62 for that purpose.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it would require the reading of section 62. I have no objection.

Mr. BURNETT. That is the section repealing certain sections and excepting certain other sections. Now, under this amendment we want to see that this section 11 is excluded from the repealing section.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Will it not require the reading of the section first?

The CHAIRMAN. The rule requires the reading of the section. Does the gentleman from Illinois ask for the reading of the section?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I will not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 62, line 13, strike out the word "or," and in line 14, preceding the word "the," insert the words "nor to repeal, alter, or amend," and in line 16 change the colon to a comma and insert the words "except as provided in section 11 hereof."

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words, for the purpose of making some remarks about the inspection service.

Mr. BURNETT. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. AUSTIN. Just two or three minutes. Prior to entering Congress I was in the Consular Service, and one of my duties was to inspect the ships and give a certificate, and also to see about the inspection of foreign emigrants as they were loaded aboard the ships. I do not know what the present methods are, but if they are similar to those eight or nine years ago they are a failure and a farce. I know a European steamship company having soliciting agents scattered all over Europe. I recall one of its officers told me it had 1,200 agents in the field soliciting emigrant business. They finally gather these emigrants at an English port; they were from various countries on the Continent. They were marched down the morning the vessel was inspected and sailed, went aboard the ship, and the medical inspection was by the physician paid by the steamship company as they marched up the gangplank. The physician now and then would have an emigrant stand aside, believing he was affected with the eye disease—trachoma.

There is no wonder we get so many people here from abroad who are defective in health, in mind, and in body. We ought to amend our immigration laws so that an American surgeon will be compelled to make a careful and thorough examination of these people prior to their going aboard ships destined for American ports.

We ought to go further in order to protect our country and our institutions. We really ought to have every emigrant in Europe who desires to come to this country furnish our consular representative before his departure from a foreign port with a statement of where he resides in the old country and references, and at the same time give our representative an opportunity to make an investigation as to what his character has been, if he is honest, industrious, and a law-abiding person and in good health, and so forth, and if he intends to make the United States his home. It would be rendering a service to many of these people, because, as has been stated here, 25,000 were returned last year, being rejected as a result of an examination at an American port. Many of them before starting for America sell their homes and all they possess, and they take their chances on passing our local examination. They are permitted to go aboard the ship, they pass the easy examination on the other side, and then when reaching American ports, where the examination is more thorough and careful, they are rejected and returned home. So in justice to the emigrant and in justice to our country we ought to require a thorough examination and investigation of the emigrant on foreign soil before he departs as to his health, character, and so forth.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. Does the gentleman know that we have a provision in this bill which makes it impossible for a steamship company to have agents abroad advertising in order to stimulate immigration?

Mr. BENNET. That has been in the law for years.

Mr. SABATH. That is a very strict provision.

Mr. AUSTIN. We ought to go further than that and have our representative on the other side make an investigation into the character of these people, whether they will be able to pass an examination on this side.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard in opposition to the amendment for the purpose of laying before the House some curious facts. It would seem at first blush as though the gentleman from Tennessee was absolutely right about inspection. I have seen examinations by American surgeons at Naples and at Genoa—Naples being one of the large ports of departure. They were good surgeons and did their work well. I have seen the steamship loaded at Liverpool, and the gentleman from Tennessee is absolutely correct as to what happens. Down at Patras, in Greece, the Austro-Americana Line sent out loads of emigrants without any inspection at all, and the result was that they were heavily fined, and in addition when the aliens came back to Fiume they nearly wrecked the place. After that the Austro-Americana people sent their physician to this country to study our ways at Ellis Island. I saw him at Patras before the people were loaded on the boat examining the aliens physically. They were so careful about it that they would stamp the man on the wrist with an indelible stamp, and the stamp was changed every day, so that nobody knew what it was except the captain of the vessel and the surgeon.

At Fiume the consul went down himself with a physician and inspected the emigrants. At the port of Antwerp the authorities told the American consul to keep off the wharf, that they would do their own inspecting, and he could have nothing to do with it.

Now, the fact was this—and I am offering the fact without any comment—that the percentage of rejection of aliens at Ellis Island who came from these four ports because of physical conditions was less as to those coming from Antwerp than those coming from Naples, Fiume, and Patras.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. AUSTIN. The very fact that the governor of the gentleman's State made a complaint about the number of aliens in the public institutions—insane and other asylums—is proof, is it not, that our methods of inspection are defective on this side even?

Mr. BENNET. No; because if a man comes in with a sound mind you can not say that he will not go crazy in three years. I will say that when I was on the Immigration Commission I took a physician and went to a number of ports—because anybody that has seen an inspection will say that they look defective—I took a physician there, and they said that the examination at Ellis Island was good. The gentleman from Massachusetts and myself in the Fifty-ninth Congress brought up the fact that Commissioner William Williams, one of the most rigid men in the service——

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. AUSTIN. How many do they inspect at Ellis Island?

Mr. BENNET. I was just about to answer the question. Commissioner Williams had the same idea that everybody has—he thought the investigation or examination was casual and inefficient—and being a man of a good deal of force, and having the power, he did this: He issued an order that the next 10,000 men that came into the port of Ellis Island should be taken into a room, stripped stark naked, and examined by four or five physicians; and that order was carried out, with the result that the percentage of rejections among the 10,000 was not noticeably different from the percentage of rejections of the 10,000 that preceded or the 10,000 that succeeded.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HAY). That is not in order.

Mr. GARDNER. Then we will have to vote upon the motion to strike out the last word.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, these discussions are very illuminating, but a great many gentlemen are very anxious that the bill should be passed speedily. There is no amendment pending to which the discussion of the two gentlemen is germane at all.

Mr. GARDNER. That is true; but the fact is that the gentleman has brought up that old ghost of examining the characters of immigrants, and every time it is brought up and no one answers it and explains the true facts it spreads an opinion abroad that our inspection is insufficient.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. The fact is that the inspection at Ellis Island is superficial in appearance only. It is true that a tremendously long line of immigrants go through the lines with the greatest rapidity, the physicians standing on each side. These doctors are wonderfully expert, because they have been at this work for years. Whenever they see a man coming along about whom there is the least doubt they chalk him as he goes by, and that means that the man must be subjected to a special examination. One of the physicians makes a specialty of examining for favus and the other for trachoma. Those immigrants who are chalked have a thorough examination, and the others have only a casual examination, as has been said. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] has told what happened when the authorities tried an experiment to find out whether in reality the casual examination was too superficial. The doctors took 10,000 men, stripped them, and found that the results of the examination of these 10,000 men were practically the same as the results obtained from subjecting 10,000 men to the usual examination which I have described.

As to the question of examining into a man's character, in deference to the agitation over that matter, we inserted in the immigration bill a few years ago a provision that when a man came out to this country from any nation which issues what are known as "penal sheets," he must produce his penal sheet. In other words, if an immigrant came from Italy, for instance, where every man has a record given him showing whether he has committed any crimes or not, we provided that when he got here that man must present his penal sheet for examination. What happened? That provision was fought tooth and nail in this House and was almost beaten. It actually was beaten in the Senate, and it nearly wrecked the whole bill. Why? Because gentlemen got up in this House and in the Senate and told how Russia and some other countries, which are supposed to entertain a hatred for certain classes of their own people, would refuse to give immigrants these penal sheets or would give them false penal sheets for the express purpose of tyrannizing over them or preventing their emigration. The result of our attempt to satisfy the demands of those gentlemen who insist on our scrutinizing the moral characters of immigrants was that we almost wrecked our bill.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I do not know that I got the full force of the gentleman's statement. Does it mean that what we call the superficial examination does not exclude more than would be excluded under a more rigid examination?

Mr. GARDNER. The 10,000 who were examined naked showed the same percentage of rejections as the 10,000 who were examined in the usual way, which has so often been alleged to be superficial.

Mr. FESS. And the conclusion is that it is not really superficial?

Mr. GARDNER. Precisely.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's amendment provided, on page 62, line 16, for striking out the colon and then inserting the language. I think the gentleman wants to insert the language before the colon and after the word "thereto."

Mr. BURNETT. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. Then, will the gentleman change his amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the Clerk will report the amendment as it is proposed to be modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 16, page 62, after the word "thereto," insert the words "except as provided in section 11 hereof."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection it will be so modified.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following as a new section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert at the end of line 4, page 22, the following as a new section: "SEC. 11a. That whenever after January 1, 1918, he may deem such action necessary, the Secretary of Labor may, at the expense of the appropriation for the enforcement of this act, detail immigrant inspectors and matrons of the United States Immigration Service for duty on vessels carrying immigrant or emigrant passengers, or passengers other than first and second cabin passengers, between ports of the United States and foreign ports. On such voyages said inspectors and matrons shall remain in that part of the vessel where immigrant passengers are carried. It shall be the duty of such inspectors and matrons to observe such passengers during the voyage and report to the immigration authorities in charge at the port of landing any information of value in determining the admissibility of such passengers under the laws regulating immigration of aliens into the United States. It shall further be the duty of such inspectors and matrons to observe violations of the provisions of such laws and the violation of such provisions of the "passenger act" of August 2, 1882, as amended, as relate to the care and treatment of immigrant passengers at sea and report the same to the proper United States officials at ports of landing. For every violation of this section any person, including any transportation company owning or operating the vessel in which such violation occurs, shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the next United States port of arrival is located the sum of $1,000 for each and every day during which such violation continues, the term "violation" to include the refusal of any person having authority so to do to permit any such immigrant inspector, matron, to be received on board such vessel, as provided in this section, and no vessel shall be granted clearance papers pending the determination of the question of the liability of such fine or while it remains unpaid, nor shall such fine be remitted or refunded: Provided, That clearance may be granted prior to the determination of all such questions upon the deposit of a sum sufficient to cover such fines and costs, such sum to be named by the Secretary of Labor: Provided further, That whenever it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor that the provisions of this section are persistently violated by or on behalf of any transportation company it shall be the duty of said Secretary to deny to such company the privilege of landing alien immigrant passengers of any or all classes at United States ports for such a period as in his judgment may be necessary to insure an observance of such provisions."

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that proposition was voted upon yesterday.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, this is not the proposition that was voted upon yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the chair was not at that time presiding.

Mr. BURNETT. The amendment was offered by Judge SABATH, of Illinois. In substance it was offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GALLAGHER], and afterwards a more elaborate amendment was offered by Judge SABATH, which embraced the same thing as Mr. GALLAGHER's and more.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in 10 minutes, the gentleman from New York to have five minutes thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I desire to say to the gentleman from Alabama that I never had a more serious purpose in my life than I have in this amendment. It may be that I shall require 10 minutes. This is not any filibuster; this is a question of life and death to the immigrant; and the gentleman ought to know it.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this conclude in 15 minutes, the gentleman to have 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all debate on this new section and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes, of which the gentleman from New York shall have 10. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, there can be no question raised that this amendment can not be enforced, because I have added to the amendment offered yesterday by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] the enforcing provisions, as found on page 11 in section 7, and if those provisions are good and enforcible there, they are good here. Now, what is the situation? I was the subcommittee of the Immigration Commission that was given charge of investigating the conditions on board steamships, and I sent women inspectors into the steerages of the various ships. I sent Italians on Italian lines; I sent people who spoke other languages on the language ships. I sent seamen and English-speaking women on the English ships. There was one particular line running into Baltimore, concerning which I chose a woman from Baltimore, and because I had my own ideas of what happened to women in the steerages, I chose a big, broad-shouldered woman who I thought could take care of herself—I am going to speak very plainly—and she went clear back into Austria and came into this country as an immigrant over the railroads and steamships, and after she got back into the port of Baltimore she made a report which was printed as a part of Senate Document No. 206, Sixty-first Congress, second session. There were no matrons on that ship, there was no care taken of or given to the women, and this is what that woman found:

> The manner in which sailors, stewards, firemen, and others mingled with the women passengers was thoroughly revolting. Their language and the topics of their conversation were vile. Their comments about the women, and made in their presence, were coarse. What was far worse and of continual occurrence was their handling of the women and girls. Some of the crew were always on deck, and took all manner of liberties with the women in broad daylight, as well as after dark.
> Not one young woman in the steerage escaped attack. The writer herself was no exception. A hard, unexpected blow in the offender's face in the presence of a large crowd of men, an evident acquaintance with the stewardess, doctor, and other officers; general experience; and manner were all required to ward off further attacks. Some few of the women, perhaps, did not find these attentions so disagreeable; some resisted them for a time, then weakened; some fought with all their physical strength, which naturally was powerless against a man's. Others were continually fleeing to escape. Two more refined and very determined Polish girls fought the men with pins and teeth, but even they weakened under this continued warfare and needed some moral support about the ninth day. The atmosphere was one of general lawlessness and total disrespect for women. It naturally demoralized the women themselves after a time. There was no one to whom they might appeal. Besides, most of them did not know the official language on the steamer, nor were they experienced enough to know they were entitled to protection.

On that very ship an immigrant girl lying seasick in her bunk was attacked by the chief steward of the ship.

Mr. AUSTIN. Now, give us the name of that steamship company.

Mr. BENNET. The vote of the commission struck that out.

Mr. AUSTIN. It ought to go in. I ask the gentleman in the interest of truth and justice to give the name of the steamship company that permitted this condition to exist.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I have no right to override the vote of the commission. Now, that is an official public document. Now, on an Italian line I sent an Italian woman, a young woman, an attractive woman, and one afternoon she was sitting on the after deck when an officer came up and made some remark, not at the beginning offensive, but he had no sooner started in than around came a surgeon of the Royal Italian Navy, put there by the Italian Government for the purpose of protecting the immigrants, and that officer went away and that young woman was not molested afterwards. That is how they protect their women. Now, in the name of all that is decent why should not we put in a provision to protect these innocent women? I will tell you what happens. In big cities along the coast there come to the hospitals girls 13, 14, and 15 years of age suffering from venereal diseases, the result of attacks of sailors and officers of vessels. It happens always under large immigration. Go into the hospitals and they will tell you, and yet this House voted down a provision yesterday to give these women protection. I made up my mind that knowing the facts it was my duty, because I was a United States officer, in the collection of information and because I had the same humane feeling for the helpless that all this House ought to have, and I believe has, that it was my duty to bring it to the attention of the House plainly, emphatically, and directly.

Mr. AUSTIN. Now, may I ask the gentleman if he called the attention of the steamship company to this case he just mentioned to the House?

Mr. BENNET. We not only called the attention of the steamship company to the occurrence, but we called the attention of the department to the occurrence.

Mr. AUSTIN. What was done?

Mr. BENNET. Oh, the steamship company said they discharged the man. But I am a United States Congressman, and I want to put inspectors and matrons on these vessels, I will say to the gentleman. [Applause.]

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Does not the gentleman consider it a very regrettable thing that that was no record vote yesterday on this question of protecting innocent women and girls on these steamships?

Mr. BENNET. I want to be fair. The House thought I was indulging in a filibuster. "Beware of the Greeks bearing gifts" But I do not think we voted particularly on the merits, and therefore I made up my mind that to-day if I had the strength and directness to do it I would bring the matter to the conscience of every man on this floor.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. I do.

Mr. CRISP. I am very much interested in what the gentleman says, and I would like to hear the gentleman discuss his amendment, as I did not hear the amendment read. What is the purpose of it?

Mr. BENNET. The purpose of the amendment is to give the Secretary of Labor, after the 1st day of January, 1918, the power, in his discretion, to put inspectors or matrons, either or both (at the expense of the United States), on every steamship sailing out of our ports. That is what my amendment is. Has my time expired?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has one minute remaining.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I have concluded.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I object. There is an agreement as to time.

Mr. GALLAGHER. I was going to ask the gentleman if he did not think that under the proposed head tax we would collect enough money to pay all those expenses?

Mr. BENNET. Certainly. We raised the head tax to $8. We have the money.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's speech is a very strong argument for the literacy test, because those people, and those conditions of which he speaks, are among the people from southern Italy, whose immigration we are trying to check.

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman is entirely in error. These are from northern countries and coming into Baltimore.

Mr. BURNETT. He stated a moment ago it was an Italian girl.

Mr. BENNET. I said the Italian Government protected the Italians.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Do you think the brutes that attack these women would fail to attack them if they were able to read or write?

Mr. BURNETT. The brutes that attack them, as a rule, Mr. Chairman, as was said by the commissioner in New York, are those from southern Italy. They are the ones that perpetrate the crimes, usually, against women. This was in the bill before. I favored it most earnestly. Great Britain, Germany, Italy, as I recollect it, Austria, and some of the other Governments, protested on the ground, as was said by the gentleman from Kentucky yesterday, that we had no right to invade their ships without their consent with our doctors.

Now, gentlemen, there is more in this than appears on the surface. If that kind of a protest is made to the President, although he might be inclined to waive his objections on the other grounds, might it not be probable that a number of countries coming and making that kind of a statement and protest to him, the gentlemen will get what some would like to have—a veto of this bill?

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?
Mr. BURNETT. If I have time.
Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman contend it would not be within the power of the Secretary of Labor to exercise the discretion said to be granted to him by this amendment?
Mr. BURNETT. No doubt about that. That is provided in the amendment, I will say to the gentleman.
Mr. MADDEN. Is provided?
Mr. BURNETT. That is, it must be done within the discretion of the Secretary of Labor.
Mr. BENNET. The amendment says that.
Mr. MADDEN. What I want to ask the gentleman is whether he contends it would not be in the power of the Secretary of Labor to exercise this power if this amendment is enacted into law?
Mr. BURNETT. Of course, that is provided in the amendment itself.
Mr. MADDEN. I understood the gentleman to say that Austria and other countries object to our exercise of this discretion.
Mr. BURNETT. They object to us giving the Secretary of Labor the discretion to do something that they say we have no right to do. We have no right to invade their ships. It could only be by their consent, and under the present law I think the Secretary of Labor would have that right if they would consent to it. We return the insane and others, yet we certainly have no right to invade foreign ships. We would have no right to put doctors on foreign ships.
Mr. Chairman, I hope gentlemen will not be swept off their feet by appeals to sympathy. These are hard cases which the gentleman names, but there is the question of the rights of nations involved in this case. An American ambassador to Italy, just before leaving here, had the matter presented to him, and he discussed it with me, and I told him that I am heartily in favor of the provision. I believe cases of the kind as mentioned by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] often occur, but the question is whether we have got the right to do as he wants us to do or not. Let us not jeopardize the passage of this bill by putting something into it of doubtful right. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I oppose the amendment, and I hope it will not be adopted.
Mr. SABATH. Could we not, as contemplated several times, deny steamships who would deny this right the right of entry?
Mr. BURNETT. Exactly.
Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.
Mr. BURNETT. The time has expired.
Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I would like one minute.
Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.
The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order.
Mr. BURNETT. Then others would want one minute. But I am willing to grant the gentleman from Rhode Island one minute and the gentleman from Massachusetts one minute.
The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request? The gentleman from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent that he may address the House for one minute. Is there objection?
Mr. BURNETT. I ask that the gentleman from Massachusetts——
The CHAIRMAN. And included with that——
Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.
Mr. BURNETT. I object to all requests.
The CHAIRMAN. The time has expired, then. Nothing remains but putting the vote on the amendment.
The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.
Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Division, Mr. Chairman.
The committee divided; and there were—ayes 59, noes 27.
So the amendment was agreed to.
The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. SIMS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3984) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JOHNSON of Maine, Mr. HUGHES, and Mr. MCCUMBER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4399) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JOHNSON of Maine, Mr. HUGHES, and Mr. MCCUMBER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

IMMIGRATION.

The committee resumed its session.
The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. That upon the arrival of any alien by water at any port within the United States on the North American Continent from a foreign port or a port of the Philippine Islands, Guam, Porto Rico, or Hawaii, or at any port of the said insular possessions from any foreign port, from a port in the United States on the North American Continent, or from a port of another insular possession of the United States, it shall be the duty of the master or commanding officer, owners, or consignees of the steamer, sailing, or other vessel having said alien on board to deliver to the immigration officers at the port of arrival typewritten or printed lists or manifests made at the time and place of embarkation of such alien on board such steamer or vessel, which shall, in answer to questions at the top of said list, contain full and accurate information as to each alien as follows: Full name, age, and sex; whether married or single; calling or occupation; personal description (including height, complexion, color of hair and eyes, and marks of identification); whether able to read or write; nationality; country of birth; race; country of last permanent residence; name and address of the nearest relative in the country from which the alien came; seaport for landing in the United States; final destination, if any, beyond the port of landing; whether having a ticket through to such final destination; by whom passage was paid; whether in possession of $50, and if less, how much; whether going to join a relative or friend, and, if so, what relative or friend, and his or her name and complete address; whether ever before in the United States, and if so, when and where; whether ever in prison or almshouse or an institution or hospital for the care and treatment of the insane; whether ever supported by charity; whether a polygamist; whether an anarchist; whether a person who believes in or advocates the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States or of all forms of law, or who disbelieves in or is opposed to organized government, or who advocates the assassination of public officials, or who advocates or teaches the unlawful destruction of property, or is a member of or affiliated with any organization entertaining and teaching disbelief in or opposition to organized government, or which teaches the unlawful destruction of property, or who advocates or teaches the duty, necessity, or propriety of the unlawful assaulting or killing of any officer or officers, either of specific individuals or of officers generally, of the Government of the United States or of any other organized Government because of his or their official character; whether coming by reason of any offer, solicitation, promise, or agreement, express or implied, to perform labor in the United States; the alien's condition of health, mental and physical; whether deformed or crippled, and if so, for how long and from what cause; and such master or commanding officer, owners, or consignees shall also furnish information in relation to the sex, age, class of travel, and the foreign port of embarkation of arriving passengers who are United States citizens. That it shall further be the duty of the master or commanding officer of every vessel taking passengers from any port of the United States on the North American Continent to a foreign port or a port of the Philippine Islands, Guam, Porto Rico, or Hawaii, or from any port of the said insular possessions to any foreign port, to a port of the United States on the North American Continent, or to a port of another insular possession of the United States to file with the immigration officials before departure a list which shall contain full and accurate information in relation to the following matters regarding all alien passengers, and all citizens of the United States or insular possessions of the United States departing with the stated intent to reside permanently in a foreign country, taken on board: Name, age, and sex; whether married or single; calling or occupation; whether able to read or write; nationality; country of birth; country of which citizen or subject; race; last permanent residence in the United States or insular possessions thereof; if a citizen of the United States or of the insular possessions thereof, whether native born or naturalized; if native born, the place and date of birth, or if naturalized the city or town in which naturalization has been had; intended future permanent residence; and time and port of last arrival in the United States, or insular possessions thereof; and such master or commanding officer shall also furnish information in relation to the sex, age, class of travel, and port of debarkation of the United States citizens departing who do not intend to reside permanently in a foreign country, and no master of any such vessel shall be granted clearance papers for his vessel until he has deposited such list or lists with the immigration officials at the port of departure and made oath that they are full and complete as to the name and other information herein required concerning each person of the classes specified taken on board his vessel; and any neglect or omission to comply with the requirements of this section shall be punishable as provided in section 14 of this act: Provided, That in the case of vessels making regular trips to ports of the United States the Commissioner General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, may, when expedient, arrange for the delivery of such lists of outgoing aliens at a later date: Provided further, That it shall be the duty of immigration officials to record the following information regarding every resident alien and citizen leaving the United States by way of the Canadian or Mexican borders for permanent residence in a foreign country: Name, age, and sex; whether married or single; calling or occupation; whether able to read or write; nationality; country of birth; country of which citizen or subject; race; last permanent residence in the United States; intended future permanent residence; and time and port of last arrival in the United States; and if a United States citizen, whether native born or naturalized.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. BENNET. If the chairman of the committee will turn to page 22 of the bill, at the beginning of this rather long section, on lines 16 and 17, he will see that the "manifests must be made at the time and place of embarkation of such alien on board such steamer or vessel, which shall, in answer to questions at the top of said list," and so forth. Then, if he will turn over to section 13, page 27, not yet read—and this is the part that I talked about with the gentleman last night—he will see that first the commanding officer, line 20, page 26, and then the surgeon, page 27, line 10, are each required to swear—and in the case of the captain it is on lines 1, 2, and 3, on page 27—that "he believes that no one of said aliens is of any of the classes excluded from admission into the United States by section 3 of this act, and that also, according to the best of his knowledge and belief, the information in said lists or manifests concerning each of said aliens named therein is correct and true in every respect." And the surgeon is required to make the same statement.

Now, of course, we have not yet reached section 13, but either the time when the manifest is made out ought to be changed in section 12 or there ought to be added, on page 27, the privilege to the surgeon to examine the aliens and find out what their condition is and amend the manifests so that the manifests will state the facts, and then swear to them.

As the situation is now, the list is made up when the aliens go on board. It may very possibly be that an alien who gets on board is afflicted with some disease which ought to keep that alien out of our country, and the surgeon ought to have the right, when he has made his examination, to make annotations on the manifests and to swear to the lists as they are, so that they will be helpful.

I have no amendment to suggest to this section unless the gentleman from Alabama wants to change the time when the manifests are made out, and I do not think he could, because the manifests are made out in the offices of the steamship companies abroad—made out in part before the alien even goes on board the vessel. But I make the suggestion now in order that the gentleman and his able assistants can take the matter into consideration by the time section 13 is reached.

Mr. BURNETT. In addition to the surgeon examining the aliens on the voyage the surgeons would have the opportunity to examine those aliens at the time of their disembarkation.

Mr. BENNET. Not necessarily.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURNETT. The surgeon on the ship sailing would certainly have the right to do that.

Mr. BENNET. But let me give the gentleman a case. Let us suppose that when the people go on board the vessel they are apparently all right; but suppose that some infectious or contagious disease, as, for instance, smallpox, breaks out within the period of incubation, and when the surgeon goes around he finds that case of smallpox. Now, under section 13, notwithstanding the fact that the man has smallpox and will be put in the hospital, the surgeon and the commanding officer are required to swear that there is nobody on the vessel that is inadmissible. The gentleman does not want that to go into the law?

Mr. BURNETT. They only swear to it at the time of the embarkation.

Mr. BENNET. No. Let me read it to the gentleman. Page 26, line 22, is to the effect that—

He has caused the surgeon of said vessel sailing therewith to make a physical and mental examination of each of said aliens, and that from the report of said surgeon and from his own investigation he believes that no one of said aliens is of any of the classes excluded from admission into the United States by section 3 of this act.

That oath is to be taken at the time of arrival into the United States. Then the provision reads further:

And that also, according to the best of his knowledge and belief the information in said lists or manifests concerning each of said aliens named therein is correct and true in every respect.

Now, take the best captain in the world, the most honest man, bringing immigrants from a foreign country. They are all right when they get on, and he puts down "John Jones, all right," all the way across the sheet. Now, John Jones develops smallpox, and yet this law requires that this captain, when they get to New York City, must swear before an official of New York City, that to his best knowledge and belief John Jones is all right.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to conclude the debate. Perhaps the gentleman from New York and I can reach an agreement on the matter. I think it is fully provided for as it is, but at the same time I have no objection to allowing a statement to be made, showing that at the time of the embarkation the condition of the immigrant was such as it was, but that during the passage something of that kind, whatever it was, developed. But certainly he ought to be required to state the condition of the alien at the time of his embarkation. I am willing that it should be modified so that if there is a change of condition it can be noted at the time of landing.

Mr. BENNET. That is satisfactory.

Mr. SABATH. Will not this provision clear your contention:

Each list or manifest shall be verified by the signature or oath or affirmation of the master or commanding officer or the first or second below him in command.

Now, it is not necessary that it should be done at the time he receives the manifest, but he can have that privilege and right to do it at any time during the voyage.

Mr. BENNET. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from Alabama that——

Mr. SABATH. It does not say that it shall be done at once.

Mr. BENNET. I agree that the commanding officer should be allowed to certify that, to the best of his knowledge, when these people came on they were all right, and then again on this side; when he gets to the port of New York City he should make a certification as to their condition when they arrive.

Mr. GARDNER. Suppose at the end of section 13 you add a proviso somewhat to this effect:

Provided, That in case any physical or mental ailment has been developed in any immigrant in transit that fact shall be noted by the captain or the surgeon on the report required by this section.

Would not that cover it?

Mr. BENNET. I think it would be better to put it the other way around, and make it affirmative.

Mr. GARDNER. When we reach section 13 you can cover it by a proviso.

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. As I understand it, the gentleman's objection is that the inward manifest is made out at the time of embarkation, and that at the time of arrival the captain or surgeon must certify that this manifest as made out at the time of embarkation is still correct.

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. While, as a matter of fact, it may not be correct?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Now, if by a proviso you allow the surgeon or captain to annotate the manifest, stating that there has been a change in transit, that is all that is necessary?

Mr. BENNET. That is all I want.

Mr. GARDNER. Then why not offer a proviso at the end of section 13?

Mr. BENNET. That is all I want. The reason I will not offer it now is because when we get to section 13, which is the next section, we can agree on that.

Mr. BURNETT. And that is the place where the amendment would apply—on section 13.

Mr. BENNET. And not on section 12.

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. BENNET. I was going to suggest that they might change the time when the manifest was made out, but I do not think they ought to do that.

Mr. BURNETT. Oh, no; the time of the making of the manifest ought not to be changed. Then, let us go on and read section 13.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Are these provisions in section 12 in reference to American citizens furnishing information—those going temporarily or permanently abroad—covered at all by the existing law, or are they entirely new?

Mr. BURNETT. What portion of the section?

Mr. MANN. In reference to the information to be furnished by the master of a vessel.

Mr. BURNETT. That is almost entirely existing law.

Mr. MANN. I think the provisions are all new.

Mr. BURNETT. The provision beginning on page 23, in line 11—

whether a person who believes in or advocates the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States or of all forms of law, or who disbelieves in or is opposed to organized government, or who advocates the assassination of public officials, or who advocates or teaches the unlawful destruction of property, or is a member of or affiliated with any organization entertaining and teaching disbelief in or opposition to organized government, or which teaches the unlawful destruction of property, or who advocates or teaches the duty, necessity, or propriety of the unlawful assaulting or killing of any officer or officers, either of specific individuals or of officers generally, of the Government of the United States or of any other organized government because of his or their official character—is new; but the part preceding line 11, page 23, is almost all in the existing law.

Mr. MANN. I am speaking of the provision in reference to information relating to American citizens going abroad, which is not in the existing law as a matter of fact, although I asked the question whether it was. What is the reason for it?

Mr. BURNETT. For outgoing passengers?

Mr. MANN. Yes; this all relates to outgoing passengers.

Mr. BURNETT. That is for the purpose of keeping track of those who are going out. It is a matter of information more than anything else.

Mr. SABATH. For statistical reasons?

Mr. BURNETT. For statistical reasons; yes.

Mr. MANN. Of course, it is rather galling to the average American citizen, if he wants to travel from one State to another, to be stopped at the border and asked for information about his life history, where he was born, and so forth, and probably it will be equally galling to give the same information if he wants to drop over into Canada, and I wondered whether there was a real necessity for it. It does not give much statistical information.

Mr. BURNETT. It was suggested by the Labor Department, as I have said, for the purpose of giving statistical information.

Mr. GARDNER. May I read what the commissioner said in 1911?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. The Commissioner General of Immigration in his annual report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, says:

> The provisions with regard to furnishing data covering passengers leaving the United States are separated from those regarding passengers entering, and extended so as to cover citizens (native born and naturalized) departing with the intent to settle abroad, and to empower immigration officials to obtain information regarding aliens and permanently departing citizens leaving the country over the land boundaries similar to that furnished by transportation companies concerning those leaving by vessels. Information regarding sex, age, class of travel, and foreign port of debarkation of departing United States citizens who do not intend to reside permanently in a foreign country is also required. This information is now secured by indirect, nonstatutory means regarding all departing passengers. These modifications of the statistical requirements are essential to the compilation of accurate figures on this very important subject. Instead of requiring manifests of outward-bound passengers, "information" only is required, and provision is made for the adoption of regulations as to the form and manner in which it shall be collected and supplied. Here also an addition is made to insure the collection of accurate and properly segregated data concerning and as between the mainland and insular possessions, respectively.

Mr. MANN. Where an American citizen goes over into Mexico, do we have any requirement now that he must pass first through the hands of an immigration official, or if he drops over from North Dakota into Canada, or from Minnesota into Canada, is he required to go through the hands of an immigration inspector?

Mr. BURNETT. We have no such requirement in our law.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that that will ever be very popular with American citizens?

Mr. BURNETT. Possibly not, and yet I do not think it would be a bad idea to keep up with those who are going over to the other side.

Mr. MANN. It might be desirable to have statistics, to know how many people pass from the State of Indiana across into Illinois or vice versa, but I imagine that the person who would try it would find himself very unpopular.

Mr. GARDNER. If you go into Canada to-day you have to fill out on the train statistics as to your intention. I think that is done for the Canadian Government as a matter of fact; but every time I go across to Canada I have to fill out a blank and hand it to the conductor of the train, for the purpose of being given to some immigration inspector.

Mr. MANN. This would apply to going across the line anywhere, even if they did not go on a train.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I shall object to any speeches which are not germane—to anything not confined to the bill.

Mr. TOWNER. I desire to oppose the pro forma amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] will be recognized first.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to speak on this particular section of the bill. I asked for time to address the House on the bill during the general debate, but could not get it. I approve of the bill and intend to vote for it, and desire at this time to briefly state my reasons for doing so.

I favor the bill because I consider it a measure of protection. It will give some protection to the workingmen of our country. Mr. Chairman, if there is any one political principle in which I believe more than all others it is that of protection. I have made some little study of the history and principles of American politics, and I can not escape the conviction that protective legislation has contributed more than all other legislation to the industrial and commercial development and growth of the Nation. I care not who originates the legislation nor what particular form it assumes. If it protects the industries of our country or the wages and working conditions of our workingmen, if it will properly add to the material welfare of any considerable class of our people, whether they be farmers, stockmen, laboring men, or others, and protects them from depressing or injurious influences from abroad, I am for it.

I have listened, Mr. Chairman, with a great deal of interest to the discussion of the bill by Members of the House. A great many fanciful and far-fetched reasons, it seems to me, have been advanced both for and against it. If I understand it, it is, after all, but a measure of protection.

It, of course, revises and amends the general immigration laws, but its ultimate purpose is to protect, so far as can be done, American society from the corrupting and disintegrating influences that would follow the movement of the prohibited classes to our shores—to protect, as far as can be done, the standard of wages and the standard of living of American workingmen from the injurious competition of the ignorant and undesirable hordes of immigrants that will want to come here. I am in favor of such protection, and therefore will vote for the bill.

This bill, Mr. Chairman, again brings us, after all, face to face with a century-old divergence of political thought that has occupied the minds of the people of the country almost since its very beginning, and has found expression in the doctrines of the two great political parties. There has always been those among our statesmen who believe that the principles of political, industrial, and social economy are universal; that in dealing with them national boundary lines should not be taken into account; they believe that, all men being created free and equal, they should be allowed to pursue their own happiness and welfare unobstructed by national boundary lines or laws; they believe that the right to trade ought to be free; that the law of life, as was so eloquently stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN], is movement; and that the people should not be obstructed in this law of movement by national restrictive immigration laws.

On the other hand, there has been those among our statesmen who believe that the problems of political, industrial, and social economy are so far national in their nature that each Government should solve them in its own way in the interest of its own people. They believe that the right to trade should not be free, if by preventing free trade a Government can add to the material welfare of its own people; they believe that each Government ought to obstruct the so-called natural law of movement among people by restrictive immigration laws, if by doing so the welfare of its own people may be protected or promoted.

This divergence of political thought has manifested itself in most of the great political battles that have been fought in this country and has always been the fundamental difference between the Democratic and Republican Parties. The Democratic Party has, generally speaking, believed that the right of free trade should meet no interference at the national boundary line by protective tariff laws; that there should be no interference by protective legislation with free competition between the laborers of America and other countries, in the price of labor.

On the other hand, the Republican Party has always believed in the wisdom of the policy of interfering with free trade among nations by such protective tariff legislation as would properly foster, encourage, and protect the industries of our own people; and that this Government should protect its own workingmen from the competition of those of other countries by such legislation as would best accomplish that result.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this same old question, it seems to me, is involved in the bill now under consideration. As I have said, it is but a measure of protection. It will help protect American workingmen in their wages and their conditions of living. It is in harmony with the principles for which the Republican Party has always stood, and therefore I am for it.

The Republican platform of 1912 contained this provision:

> We pledge the Republican Party to the enactment of appropriate laws to give relief from the constantly growing evil of induced or undesirable immigration which is inimical to the progress and welfare of the people of the United States.

It is only the evil of "induced" or "undesirable" immigration that this bill seeks to provide against. And I confess I am unable to understand the attitude of those few Republicans here who are opposed to this bill. We have always believed in the policy of protecting American labor from the competition of the cheaper labor of foreign countries by a protective tariff. We have told the people in every great campaign that American industries could not maintain American wages and the better standard of living for American laborers unless protected, by proper tariff laws, from the competition of the industries of foreign countries where the standard of living was lower and the wages of labor so much less than in America. We have advocated a protective tariff because it would protect American workingmen from the competition of the cheaper labor in other countries. Why should we not protect American workingmen, as far as we can, from the competition of ignorant and undesirable foreign laborers who would come into this country, especially when we know that they have been and will be brought in great numbers by the steamship companies and others for selfish purposes?

Mr. Chairman, in legislating upon a question of this kind I want to be consistent as well as conscientious; and I agree with the statement made here last Saturday by the distinguished chairman of the committee, Mr. BURNETT, that those few Republicans who are against this bill are not consistent.

On the other hand, it is a real pleasure to see so many of our Democratic friends supporting this protective legislation. You gentleman on that side of the House are ordinarily so skeptical, so scary about anything that sounds like protection, it must be a genuine surprise to the country to see so many of you supporting this bill. And I want to say that in voting for this bill you Democrats are no more consistent with the past attitude of the Democratic Party toward American labor than are those Republicans who are voting against it.

Many of you Democrats who are going to vote for this bill, which will help to protect American labor from the competition of ignorant and undesirable labor that would come or be brought into this country, will, nevertheless, oppose a protective tariff which would protect American labor from the competition of the cheaper labor of those working in foreign countries.

No; you Democrats are not consistent with the past policy of your party toward American labor in supporting this protective legislation. But you are right in doing so. And I am glad to have you go with us thus far in doing this much for the laboring men of our country. I, of course, do not know how true it is, but I am told, Mr. Chairman, that this bill, if it passes Congress, will be vetoed, and that if we would have this legislation we must pass it over the President's veto. A similar bill passed by the last Congress was vetoed, and we naturally suppose, unless the President reverses himself on this question, as he has on so many other questions in the past two years, this bill will likewise be vetoed. I have heard, too, that the majority party at the other end of the Capitol will try to prevent this bill from passing the Senate in order to prevent the political embarrassment of another presidential veto. I am disposed to share the views of those who fear that after the European war closes and the millions of men now under arms are released, the most desirable of the laborers will remain in their native countries while many of the undesirable will want to come to the United States. So we have need for this legislation now, as we have never needed it before, and I believe that the political party that defeats this bill, whether its defeat be accomplished by one means or another, will have to answer to American labor when American labor has another chance to speak at the polls.

Mr. Chairman, on September 5, 1912, after the President had been nominated, he made an address before the Association of Foreign Language Newspapers in New York City, and was reported by the papers as saying on that occasion:

> I am speaking to you as also Americans with myself, and just as much American as myself, and if we all take the American point of view, namely, that we want American life kept to its standards, and that only the standards of American life shall be standards of restriction, then we are all upon a common ground, not of those who criticize immigration, but those who declare themselves Americans. * * * Of course, if the immigrants are allowed to come in uninstructed hosts, and to stop at the ports where they enter and there to compete in an oversupplied labor market, there is going to be unhappiness; there is going to be deterioration; there is going to be everything that will be detrimental to the immigrant.

It will be noticed that the President used the expression "uninstructed hosts," and said such immigration would result in unhappiness and in deterioration. Yet the President afterwards reversed himself and vetoed a bill which had no other purpose than to prevent the induced or undesirable immigration of "uninstructed hosts." And that is all this bill will do. I am convinced that the American people want this legislation. Farmers' organizations, labor organizations, and other organizations have indorsed it. And the objections to it are, to my mind, only fanciful and theoretical.

Mr. Chairman, I represent a district where there are many laboring men. There are eight or ten thousand coal miners there, to say nothing of thousands more engaged in other kinds of labor. Those men are organized and have made a study for years of labor conditions in this country. I have respect for their judgment. I have sympathy for their aspirations. I am interested in their welfare. I have no doubt they fairly represent the other laboring men all over this country of ours, and so far as I can conscientiously do so I will support any legislation that will protect them—that will fairly maintain their wages or improve their standard of living and their condition in life.

I have received many letters and resolutions from the people of my district urging me to support this bill. I have not yet received one against it. And I am happy in the belief that in supporting it my own conscientious judgment is in entire harmony with the wishes of the people I represent.

I do not share the belief, or, rather, the suspicion, of those who have professed to see a question of religious discrimination involved in this legislation. It is not the purpose of the bill to prevent people of any particular religion from coming to this country. Neither do I share the views of those who have asserted that it is aimed at the people of any particular nation. No one who would be of any value to this country will be excluded by the provisions of this bill.

It is only a question of self-protection after all. Every nation has the right to and should enact such legislation as is necessary or desirable for its own protection and perpetuity. To that end it is the course of wisdom to surround the sources of our population with such safeguards as will prepare all of our people as far as possible for the duties as well as the privileges of citizenship in the Republic. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe the literacy test provided in this bill is either arbitrary or unfair. It is in keeping with our ideals. Education is the very foundation of our Republic. We have made it compulsory in nearly all, if not all, of the States of the Union. We compel our own people to acquire at least some education. Why should we not require it of those who would come here from other lands? This country will not suffer by the exclusion of those who could not pass the literacy test provided by this bill. If it becomes a law the requirements will soon become known in other lands, and those who would really want to come to America to live—who would be worthy of citizenship in a Republic—would soon learn to read and write well enough to pass the literacy test. Others we do not want.

I can not but admire the sentiments of those who still cling with a sort of tenacious fetishism to the old doctrine that America is an asylum for the oppressed and its doors must be left open for the free entry of any who would come from the four corners of the earth. That idea belonged to former generations. It is a beautiful thought, but in the practical application of it to the conditions of our day, with our hundred millions of people, we must look to our own preservation and the perpetuity of our institutions and ideals. No one claims that ignorance is necessarily an indication of dishonesty or undesirability. It seems distressingly fanciful to me to refer with pitying pathos to our noble ancestors who could not read or write as an argument against the literacy test.

The great majority of the American people have come to believe that on the whole the higher the average of education and intelligence of our people the better it will be for their happiness and progress. One does not necessarily have to be able to read and write in order to be a good citizen. But we must advocate and encourage popular education or abandon our ideals and weaken the very foundation of the Republic. And I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the enforcement of the literacy test in the admission of immigration into this country will be but an exemplification of one of the popular ideals of our people, and will not only tend to protect our labor and purify our population but will increase the respect and esteem in which we are held by other nations.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to say in conclusion that I would not favor this bill if it closed our doors either to political or religious refugees from any country or to people of other countries who are qualified for citizenship here. But the former are expressly exempt from the provisions of the bill, and the latter are not excluded at all. There are many Germans, French, English, Italians, Russians, and other nationalities in the district I represent. Most of them are good citizens. Many of them are among our best farmers, miners, and merchants. And I do not believe those who are here would complain at the provisions of this bill. Most of them, Mr. Chairman, are themselves laboring men, and no doubt share with other laboring men of the country the belief that American labor should at least have the protection that will result from the provisions of this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire a few minutes to call the attention of the House to what I conceive to be the constitutional power of Congress to regulate and control the conditions under which foreign vessels may bring immigrants to this country. The power that the Constitution grants to Congress over foreign commerce is absolute. There is no limitation whatever. It is within the power of Congress to prohibit any foreign ships coming to our shores. It is within the power of Congress to make any condition that it desires upon which vessels may enter our ports and upon which vessels may be allowed to clear from our ports. It is within the power of Congress to pass any laws that they may deem wise or advisable regulating the conditions under which emigrants may be brought to this country. I can conceive of no condition that might arise that would interfere in the slightest degree with the full exercise of this power, except one, and that may be treaty agreements with foreign nations. There is no other limitation that can be placed on the power of Congress to absolutely regulate these matters.

So, when gentlemen talk about the foreign vessels being foreign territory, which we could not invade for the purpose of inspecting immigrants, they are laboring under a misapprehension regarding the power of Congress. We can say that no such vessels shall enter our ports unless they allow inspectors to be placed on the vessels at the port of departure and that they be allowed to inspect the emigrants on the voyage over. We can impose any regulation of that character that we deem wise or expedient. So Congress need feel no hesitancy in imposing any judicious law they think right on a vessel entering or clearing our ports that goes to the protection of the immigrant or of the people of the United States. Nearly all the immigrants coming to this country are brought here on foreign vessels. Naturally, these foreign steamship companies want to be as free as possible from restraint and control by this country. Instead of that being a reason why we should allow them relief from surveillance, we should consider it a reason why we should subject such commerce to control, in our own interest and in the interest of humanity. I am glad to anticipate that if this bill becomes a law the conditions of the immigrant will be materially improved and our own country will be further protected from undesirable immigrants.

Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island was recognized.

Mr. BURNETT rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama desire recognition?

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, was not the gentleman from Rhode Island recognized before that?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that he asked the gentleman from Alabama if he desired recognition, and the gentleman from Alabama went on and made his motion. The Chair had before that recognized the gentleman from Rhode Island.

Mr. BURNETT. Very well, Mr. Chairman; I give notice that I shall object to any discussion not pertinent to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the motion of the gentleman from Rhode Island?

Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island. I move to strike out the last three words. Mr. Chairman, on Saturday last, during a period when I was not in the House, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] addressed a statement to the House in an endeavor to administer a gentle tap to my distinguished colleague, Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. His language was as follows:

> Why, my friends, Brown University gave to the country Horace Mann, this country's greatest educator, and the founder of the common-school system of America. He was a son of Massachusetts but an alumnus of Brown. It gave Mr. Justice Hughes, who is much talked about to-day in the country. [Loud applause.] It gave our country, the United States, the greatest State university president, namely, Prof. Angell, of Michigan University. [Applause.] And it gave a former superintendent of the public schools of Chicago, President E. Benjamin Andrews. Mr. Chairman, the States so advanced on educational lines, with such achievements to their credit, see their Representatives vote against this educational test. [Applause.]

Now, I respectfully yield to the gentleman from Ohio in order that he may explain, for the moment, whether or not he desired to leave the inference that any of these distinguished gentlemen whom he named in that statement favor a literacy test.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island. I will.

Mr. FESS. In reply to the question by the gentleman from Rhode Island I will say that I have not any direct or specific information from any one of these men as to whether they would stand for the educational test or not, and had not that in my mind when I spoke. Since the gentleman has read it, I can see that that inference might have been drawn that I might have thought that they stood for the test. I want to be frank with the gentleman from Rhode Island, as well as with the House, in stating that I had no information whatever. I rather think they would stand for it, however, but that is only an opinion.

Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island. Mr. Chairman, I am glad the gentleman from Ohio made the last statement. He completely cleared himself of any intention to leave the inference which I thought could plainly be drawn from the language he indulged in on Saturday; but being a college president himself, and a very distinguished one, and guiding the destinies of an institution over which Horace Mann, one of the gentlemen named formerly presided, undoubtedly he feels that the members still living of that great galaxy of Brown University's sons entertain the same opinion he does with respect to the literacy test.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Rhode Island has expired.

Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island. Mr. Chairman, I ask for three minutes more.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I object. I move that all debate on this amendment close in five minutes.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Rhode Island be permitted to proceed.

Mr. BURNETT. I object. The question of Brown University is not an issue to-day.

Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island. Mr. Chairman, my remarks are connected with this bill.

Mr. BURNETT. I object.

Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. BURNETT. I will not object to two minutes.

Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of no quorum. I was about to say that I object to being placed in the picture painted by the gentleman from Ohio to be looked upon by this House as a Member who would oppose a policy that is essentially educational. I do not think that this literacy test is educational, although the last sentence indulged in by my friend from Ohio [Mr. FESS] on Saturday is that this is an educational test. The literacy test is not an educational test. The term "education" covers a much broader field than does the term "literacy." In looking up hurriedly the question as to whether these distinguished and scholarly sons of Brown, whom he named, ever favored a literacy test, I found certain information which I desire at this time to lay before the House, and incidentally disabuse the gentleman's mind of what he thinks might be the opinion of these gentlemen on the matter. Of course, Horace Mann lived a number of years ago. He was very distinguished, both in educational and philanthropic lines. An educational test of any nature, or a literacy test, would be a thing unthinkable in those days, as it ought to be at the present time, and one would not expect, therefore, that Horace Mann would have uttered any views on the subject. But in a lecture which he delivered in Portland on August 30 and 31, 1844, he gave the following definition of education, and it has an important bearing on this matter under discussion:

> I hardly need to say, that by the word "education," I mean much more than an ability to read, write, and keep common accounts. I comprehend under this noble word such a training of the body as shall build it up with robustness and vigor, enabling it to act, formatively, upon the crude substances of nature—to turn a wilderness into cultivated fields, forests into ships, or quarries or clay pits into villages and cities.

That definition comports exactly with the position taken by those who oppose the literacy test on this floor. Mr. Chairman, I also discovered that Dr. E. Benjamin Andrews, as late as 1913, said some very emphatic things concerning immigration on the phase of amalgamating our foreign born:

> The slow amalgamation of outlanders is not a national peril. Our citizenship from abroad is, in the main, good and the least likely part of it will become valuable with time. The Nation's experience with immigration hitherto is ground for hope.

Speaking about the tendency of foreigners to flock together, President Andrews says:

> The superciliousness of Americans tends to make foreigners herd. Men whose fathers, grandfathers, or great-grandfathers were themselves immigrants put on an air of superiority toward people landing yesterday.
> In many cases this nucleization among Americans of foreign origin is harmless. Elsewhere, though showing a bad side, it is so evanescent that no patriot need lose sleep over it.
> Immigrants, however ignorant, should be shown a sympathetic spirit, not avoided, scolded, or dealt with in a patronizing way. Present statutes excluding undesirable foreigners should be carried out with discrimination and in good faith.

Not a solitary word in favor of the literacy test. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Rhode Island has expired.

Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island. I wish I could obtain more time.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. SLAYDEN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill and joint resolution of the following titles:

H. R. 13768. An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the Military Establishment for the fiscal year 1916; and

H. J. Res. 68. Joint resolution to cede to the State of Maryland temporary jurisdiction over certain lands in the Fort McHenry Military Reservation.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives is requested:

S. 4476. An act to amend an act to authorize the Dauphin Island Railway & Harbor Co., its successors or assigns, to construct and maintain a bridge, or bridges, or viaducts, across the water between the mainland at or near Cedar Point, and Dauphin Island, both Little and Big; also to dredge a channel from the deep waters of Mobile Bay into Dauphin Bay; also to construct and maintain docks and wharves along both Little and Big Dauphin Islands, as amended by an act approved June 18, 1912.

IMMIGRATION.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That all aliens arriving by water at the ports of the United States shall be listed in convenient groups, the names of those coming from the same locality to be assembled so far as practicable, and no one list or manifest shall contain more than 30 names. To each alien or head of a family shall be given a ticket on which shall be written his name, a number or letter designating the list in which his name, and other items of information required by this act, are contained, and his number on said list, for convenience of identification on arrival. Each list or manifest shall be verified by the signature and the oath or affirmation of the master or commanding officer, or the first or second below him in command, taken before an immigration officer at the port of arrival, to the effect that he has caused the surgeon of said vessel sailing therewith to make a physical and mental examination of each of said aliens, and that from the report of said surgeon and from his own investigation he believes that no one of said aliens is of any of the classes excluded from admission into the United States by section 3 of this act, and that also according to the best of his knowledge and belief the information in said lists or manifests concerning each of said aliens named therein is correct and true in every respect. That the surgeon of said vessel sailing therewith shall also sign each of said lists or manifests and make oath or affirmation in like manner before an immigration officer at the port of arrival, stating his professional experience and qualifications as a physician and surgeon, and that he has made a personal examination of each of the said aliens named therein, and that the said list or manifest, according to the best of his knowledge and belief, is full, correct, and true in all particulars relative to the mental and physical condition of said aliens. If no surgeon sails with any vessel bringing aliens, the mental and physical examinations and the verifications of the lists or manifests shall be made by some competent surgeon employed by the owners of the said vessels, and the manifests shall be verified by such surgeon before a United States consular officer.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 27, line 20, change the period to a colon, and add:

"Provided, That if any changes in the condition of said aliens should occur or develop during the voyage of the vessel on which they are traveling, such changes shall be noted on the manifest before the verification thereof."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the gentleman modify his amendment by striking out the word "should," so that it will read:

Provided, That if any changes in the condition of said aliens occur, etc.

Mr. BURNETT. I will accept that suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the modification will be made as indicated.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment reported as modified?

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 27, line 20, change the period to a colon, and add:

"Provided, That if any changes in the condition of said aliens occur or develop during the voyage of the vessel on which they are traveling, such changes shall be noted on the manifest before the verification thereof."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that that amendment covers the proposition, and while the language may not turn out to be the very best, there is another place where it can be corrected if necessary. The main error is corrected, and I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 27, lines 19 and 20, strike out the words "a United States consular officer" and insert "an officer competent to administer oaths."

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, the language of this section is vague and it is not anywhere certain where the oath is to be taken, except that it apparently is to be taken upon arrival in this country. I think that a better amendment even than the one that I have offered would be to leave in the words "a United States consular officer" and add "or an officer competent to administer oaths." Then it would cover cases of both manifests. It would cover the case of the manifest as it was put on the vessel abroad and the case of the manifest as it was amended when the vessel came into the port of the United States.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, the change was made in the Senate. It was not a change of ours, and I think the suggestion of the gentleman is a good one, and I will accept the amendment.

Mr. BENNET. Then I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment so as not to strike out those words, but to add the words "or an officer competent to administer oaths."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 27, lines 19 and 20, after the word "officer," in line 20, add "or an officer competent to administer oaths."

Mr. BURNETT. Change the period to a comma.

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. And then add "or other officer competent to administer oaths."

Mr. MANN. That is, to insert after the word "officer," in line 20, the words "or other officer competent to administer oaths."

Mr. BURNETT. Yes; to strike out the period and change it to a comma.

Mr. MANN. The engrossing clerk will attend to that part of it.

Mr. BURNETT. "Authorized" is a better word than "competent."

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment in its final form.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the period after the word "officer" and insert a comma and insert "or other officer authorized to administer oaths."

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Chairman, the amendment ought to read, "insert after the word 'officer.'" There is no comma required there and you do not strike out the period.

Mr. BURNETT. The period would be at the end of the inserted words.

Mr. MANN. Why, of course.

Mr. BURNETT. That is right. Just add the words "or other officer authorized to administer oaths" after the word "officer" and the period then automatically goes to the end of the sentence.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 15. That upon the arrival at a port of the United States of any vessel bringing aliens it shall be the duty of the proper immigration officials to go or to send competent assistants to the vessel and there inspect all such aliens, or said immigration officials may order a temporary removal of such aliens for examination at a designated time and place, but such temporary removal shall not be considered a landing, nor shall it relieve vessels, the transportation lines, masters, agents, owners, or consignees of the vessel upon which said aliens are brought to any port of the United States from any of the obligations which, in case such aliens remain on board, would under the provisions of this act bind the said vessels, transportation lines, masters, agents, owners, or consignees: Provided, That where removal is made to premises owned or controlled by the United States, said vessels, transportation lines, masters, agents, owners, or consignees, and each of them, shall, so long as detention there lasts, be relieved of responsibility for the safekeeping of such aliens. Whenever a temporary removal of aliens is made the vessels or transportation lines which brought them and the masters, owners, agents, and consignees of the vessel upon which they arrive shall pay all expenses of such removal and all expenses arising during subsequent detention, pending decision on the aliens' eligibility to enter the United States and until they are either allowed to land or returned to the care of the line or to the vessel which brought them, such expenses to include those of maintenance, medical treatment in hospital or elsewhere, burial in the event of death, and transfer to the vessel in the event of deportation, excepting only where they arise under the terms of any of the provisos of section 18 hereof. Any refusal or failure to comply with the provisions hereof shall be punished in the manner specified in section 18 of this act.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to have the attention of the chairman for the purpose of calling attention to the fact that the manner specified in section 18 of this act apparently does not fit the offense under section 15; and as section 15 is a rather important section, and a good deal of it new, and it amounts to a good deal of money to some people if they could evade it, it seems to me there ought to be a provision in here for punishing the person who does not comply with the provision. Now, I am very frank to say I have not myself worked out any proposition, but I have come to the very definite conclusion that the language "shall be punished in the manner specified in section 18 of this act" does not cover any of the offenses on page 29. Now, I have no suggestion to make. I do not think I am entitled to make any suggestion unless I have formulated it in the form of an amendment; but in the form in which the section is it can be violated at will.

Mr. BURNETT. Because there is no penalty attached to it?

Mr. BENNET. That is exactly the suggestion I make to the gentleman.

Mr. BURNETT. It says, "shall be punished in the manner specified in section 18 of this act."

Mr. BENNET. If the gentleman will turn to section 18 and read it with care, although it is a pretty long section, he will find that there are two or three methods, and so forth, in there—bonds and everything else.

Mr. BURNETT. Does not the gentleman think that at the bottom of page 36——

Mr. BENNET. I do not, because that provision is to the effect if the consignee has violated any of the foregoing provisions.

Mr. BURNETT. It says there, "if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor such person," and so forth, "has violated any of the foregoing provisions."

Mr. BENNET. That is section 18.

Mr. BURNETT. It does not say that. I think it would relate back to section 15, and it also refers to section 18.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, if he will read a little further he will see that it says that for the violation of the foregoing provision the punishment is in the sum of $300 for each and every violation of all the provisions of this section. That is section 18. Whatever he may have violated he can only be punished for a violation of section 18, apparently. I have not given it, however, very careful attention.

Mr. BENNET. I gave it careful attention, and I am frank to say I was negligent in that I should have drawn an amendment, but I had several other amendments.

Mr. BURNETT. Let us pass it over, and I will ask some of the lawyers about that.

Mr. BENNET. Does the gentleman ask unanimous consent to pass it without prejudice?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes. Has the gentleman any other amendment to this section?

Mr. BENNET. To section 15 I have no amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the section just read be passed with leave to recur to it at some future time to make such motion as the gentleman may think appropriate in reference to the same. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 16. That the physical and mental examination of all arriving aliens shall be made by medical officers of the United States Public Health Service who shall have had at least two years' experience in the practice of their profession since receiving the degree of doctor of medicine, and who shall certify, for the information of the immigration officers and the boards of special inquiry hereinafter provided for, any and all physical and mental defects or diseases observed by said medical officers in any such alien; or, should medical officers of the United States Public Health Service be not available, civil surgeons of not less than four years' professional experience may be employed in such emergency for such service, upon such terms as may be prescribed by the Commissioner General of Immigration, under the direction or with the approval of the Secretary of Labor. All aliens arriving at ports of the United States shall be examined by two such medical officers at the discretion of the Secretary of Labor, and under such regulations as he may prescribe. Medical officers of the United States Public Health Service who have had especial training in the diagnosis of insanity and mental defect shall be detailed for duty or employed at all ports of entry designated by the Secretary of Labor, and such medical officers shall be provided with suitable facilities for the detention and examination of all arriving aliens in whom insanity or mental defect is suspected, and the services of interpreters shall be provided for such examination. Any alien certified for insanity or mental defect may appeal to the board of Public Health surgeons, and may introduce before such board one expert medical witness at his own cost and expense. That the inspection, other than the physical and mental examination, of aliens, including those seeking admission or readmission to or the privilege of passing through or residing in the United States, and the examination of aliens arrested within the United States under this act, shall be conducted by immigrant inspectors, except as hereinafter provided in regard to boards of special inquiry. All aliens arriving at ports of the United States shall be examined by at least two immigrant inspectors at the discretion of the Secretary of Labor and under such regulations as he may prescribe. Immigrant inspectors are hereby authorized and empowered to board and search for aliens any vessel, railway car, or any other conveyance, or vehicle in which they believe aliens are being brought into the United States. Said inspectors shall have power to administer oaths and to take and consider evidence touching the right of any alien to enter, reenter, pass through, or reside in the United States, and, where such action may be necessary, to make a written record of such evidence; and any person to whom such an oath has been administered, under the provisions of this act, who shall knowingly or willfully give false evidence or swear to any false statement in any way affecting or in relation to the right of any alien to admission, or readmission to, or to pass through, or to reside in the United States shall be deemed guilty of perjury and be punished as provided by section 125 of the act approved March 4, 1909, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States." Any commissioner of immigration or inspector in charge shall also have power to require the attendance and testimony of witnesses before said inspectors and the production of books, papers, and documents touching the right of any alien to enter, reenter, reside in, or pass through the United States, and to that end may invoke the aid of any court of the United States; and any district court within the jurisdiction of which investigations are being conducted by an immigrant inspector may, in the event of neglect or refusal to respond to a subpœna issued by any commissioner of immigration or inspector in charge or refusal to testify before said immigrant inspector, issue an order requiring such person to appear before said immigrant inspector, produce books, papers, and documents if demanded, and testify; and any failure to obey such order of the court shall be punished by the court as a contempt thereof. That any person, including employees, officials, or agents of transportation companies, who shall assault, resist, prevent, impede, or interfere with any immigration official or employee in the performance of his duty under this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment for a term of not less than six months nor more than two years, or by a fine of not less than $200 nor more than $2,000; and any person who shall use any deadly or dangerous weapon in resisting any immigration official or employee in the performance of his duty shall be deemed guilty of a felony and shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by imprisonment for not less than 1 nor more than 10 years. Every alien who may not appear to the examining immigrant inspector at the port of arrival to be clearly and beyond a doubt entitled to land shall be detained for examination in relation thereto by a board of special inquiry. In the event of rejection by the board of special inquiry, in all cases where an appeal to the Secretary of Labor is permitted by this act, the alien shall be so informed and shall have the right to be represented by counsel or other adviser on such appeal. The decision of an immigrant inspector, if favorable to the admission of any alien, shall be subject to challenge by any other immigrant inspector, and such challenge shall operate to take the alien whose right to land is so challenged before a board of special inquiry for its investigation.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 30, line 16, by adding at the end of the line the words "not less than."

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, if I can have the attention of the chairman of the committee, I want to congratulate the committee on their praiseworthy effort to secure a competent medical examination in every instance, but I do not think that they meant to limit the number of physicians who were to make the examination to two. In close cases now on Ellis Island four or five physicians examine a man. I think what the committee meant was that at least two should examine. If you will put in the language I have suggested, "not less than," you have secured what I think the committee was after and also have not taken away the right that the board now has to call in four or five members of the staff in close cases in order to decide.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. It says "at the discretion of the Secretary of Labor."

Mr. BENNET. I saw that. It is not clear, and the words "not less than," it seems to me, might serve a very useful purpose. The idea of the committee was that no one doctor acting alone could adopt a view which would reject an alien, and before the alien could be rejected in every case at least two doctors should examine him.

Mr. MANN. If I recall, the language "at the discretion of the Secretary of Labor and under such regulations as he may prescribe," is new in the bill.

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I am not sure that saying "shall be examined by not less than two medical officers, at the discretion of the Secretary of Labor," would change the meaning at all.

Mr. BENNET. You mean as to the discretionary part?

Mr. MANN. It is at the discretion of the Secretary of Labor.

Mr. BENNET. Yes. The gentleman from New Jersey calls my attention to the fact that in the same section the expression "at least two inspectors" is "at the discretion of the Secretary of Labor."

Mr. BURNETT. I think there is no objection to the language the gentleman suggests. I think it would be considered that way. It is for the purpose of giving them two, anyway, and I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. MANN. Of course, it is all left to the discretion of the Secretary of Labor under this new language. That language was not in the bill, if I recall correctly, that passed the House before.

Mr. BENNET. I want to make it sure.

Mr. MANN. The language as to the inspectors on the next page, lines 14 and 15, to which the gentlemen from New Jersey just called the attention of the gentleman, "the discretion of the Secretary of Labor," is now new. To say that a thing shall be done by, at least, so many, in the discretion of the Secretary or somebody else, adds nothing whatever. It is at his discretion as to whether it shall be done by more or less, or none at all.

Mr. BENNET. I think the gentleman is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] has expired.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BURNETT. I think it will be acceptable, Mr. Chairman.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 31, line 3, strike out the words "board of Public Health surgeons" and insert "Bureau of the Public Health Service."

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, there is no such bureau of the Government as the Bureau of the Public Health Service. The Public Health Service——

Mr. BENNET. I simply fell into the same error as the committee did, then, because there is no such body as the board of public health surgeons. Mr. Chairman, the committee attempted to do a very excellent thing, and I am glad the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is correct as to the language. They attempt to provide, for the first time in the history of immigration, that an alien certified for mental disease may appeal to somebody and may bring before such board one expert medical witness at his own cost and expense. As the law stands now an alien who is charged with insanity is examined by the surgeons at the port of entry only and without right of appeal or expert witness. This committee did give him the expert witness, and now, if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will give us the correct description of the service——

Mr. HAYES. Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service.

Mr. MANN. The title is the "Public Health Service." We call it the "United States Public Health Service." But I think if the gentleman will add the word "Service" after the word "Health," in line 3, it will cover all he wants.

Mr. BENNET. That you make it "a" instead of "the" in front of "Board."

Mr. MANN. It is not so unless it is so created.

Mr. BENNET. The mere language mentioning the board does not create it. I think "a" board is right.

Mr. BURNETT. That is called a board by the Public Health Service, and those that they designate are expected to act under this bill at the call of the public health board.

Mr. BENNET. They might as well call it the Ten Commandments. But I think if the gentleman from Illinois is correct, and——

Mr. MANN. Make it a board of public health surgeons.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Should it not be a board of surgeons of the Public Health Service?

Mr. BENNET. If the gentleman will stop and recall, there are boards of these surgeons over the United States, and if you say "the board" then you limit appeal to some one particular board unless you state "the board of public health surgeons" at the particular port. But if you state "a board," then there can be any number of appeals pending at the same time.

Mr. MANN. I should not think that would make any difference.

Mr. BENNET. I should.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, this amendment was drawn by myself and presented to the committee. At each of the stations there is what is known as the board of Public Health surgeons, consisting of three surgeons connected with the Public Health Service of the United States, and this bill now provides for such a board.

Mr. MANN. Where?

Mr. BENNET. Nowhere.

Mr. BURNETT. I am inclined to believe that the word "the" is a proper word, because it is the particular board designated at those places.

Mr. BENNET. Then, you ought to make it read something like this: "The board of Public Health surgeons" at that particular port, or something like that, because if you simply say, "The board of Public Health surgeons" that is the idea of exclusion. Suppose one man was certified at Boston and another at San Francisco and another at New York——

Mr. BURNETT. I think, gentlemen, that is highly technical.

Mr. BENNET. I am in sympathy with what the gentleman is trying to do, and I congratulate him on it.

Mr. BURNETT. I understand.

Mr. MANN. How would it be to say, "the proper board"?

Mr. BURNETT. I think that is satisfactory.

Mr. SABATH. If any amendment is to be accepted, would not the word "proper" be the one?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand that the language is agreed upon by the gentlemen?

Mr. BENNET. I suggest it should read "The proper board of Public Health Service surgeons."

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make an inquiry, if the language just suggested should be adopted. The words "proper board" would simply refer to one single board or group of men?

Mr. MANN. That would mean the board at the city or port.

Mr. BENNET. You can say "The board of Public Health Service surgeons at the port of arrival." Then there would be no question.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Would not this language that I previously suggested absolutely answer the purpose? "A board of Public Health Service surgeons."

Mr. BURNETT. That has been suggested by the law officer of the department.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by providing as follows:

A board of surgeons of the Public Health Service.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That covers it in every port.

Mr. BURNETT. That is the suggestion made by the law officer of the department.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the amendment as it has been agreed upon.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 31, lines 2 and 3, so that the language would read: "Any alien certified for insanity or mental defect may appeal to a board of the Public Health surgeons.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no. It should be "to a board of surgeons of the Public Health Service."

Mr. BENNET. Is that satisfactory to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes. I did not understand whether it had been changed or not.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Clerk erroneously reported it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment as it will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To a board of surgeons of the Public Health Service.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 32, line 22, strike out "shall" and insert "may."

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I think possibly we have the right to confer on the court jurisdiction to punish for contempt in such cases as this; but I do not think there is any authority in Congress or in any other legislative body to say to a court created by it that it shall punish a particular offense as a contempt. That is for the court to say. We can confer authority to punish such a thing as contempt, but we can not make it mandatory and say that they shall punish such a thing as a contempt.

Mr. BURNETT. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 33, lines 3 and 4, strike out the words "less than six months nor."

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, when we adopted the Penal Code here a few years ago we entered upon a policy of abolishing minimum sentences; and I think, with the exception, possibly, of two or three sections of the Penal Code, there are no minimum sentences. Of course, the argument for that is very familiar. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON]——

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Did we not also adopt the policy in the Criminal Code of defining what a misdemeanor is and what a felony is? Here it is provided that the punishment shall be not more than two years. That of itself would make it a felony under existing law, but it is described here as a misdemeanor.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Florida was a very able assistant United States attorney. I am very glad to say that, inasmuch as I do not carry the language of the penal code in mind, if the gentleman says that is the provision of the penal code it is the provision of the penal code. If that is so, it is another error that ought to be corrected, and I suggest that the gentleman draft a provision for that purpose. But my purpose was to make this immigration law correspond to the general statutes of the country. If it was a good work to abolish minimum sentences throughout the penal law, then they ought to be abolished under this act. That is the sum and substance of the argument.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman. I do not agree with the gentleman. I suppose that almost all the States have minimum fines and minimum sentences. We should not want to say that there should be a fine of $2,000 in all cases or that there should be a fine of not more than $200. I do not agree with the idea that that ought to be stricken out.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MANN. We simply fixed the maximum penalty. The judge will fix the penalty. We did that all through the criminal code. I do not think there is a minimum penalty in the criminal code.

Mr. BURNETT. If we revised it that way, Mr. Chairman, I doubt if we acted wisely. There might be a case where there was a minimum of 1 cent. There ought to be a minimum penalty.

Mr. MANN. Under the criminal code that is left to the judge as to the amount.

Mr. BURNETT. As to the amount of the fine?

Mr. MANN. Yes. I think there has been very little criticism of that under ordinary conditions. In other words, cases have happened where no one desired a minimum penalty and where because of a minimum penalty they were not convicted at all.

Mr. BENNET. That is what would happen here.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON], I think, was on the commission, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] was a very active member of the commission that revised the criminal code, and since that time we have endeavored in Congress to maintain the same policy by providing only for a maximum penalty and not providing for a minimum penalty. I care nothing about it, as far as this is concerned; but, having adopted that policy in the criminal code, I have always tried, where I had anything to do with the law, to maintain the same policy.

Mr. BENNET. I will say to the gentleman that the best practical argument in favor of my amendment is the fact that where a jury know that there is a fairly high minimum penalty they will hesitate to convict. Now, for instance, page 32, line 25, provides—

That any person * * * who shall * * * impede * * * any immigration official or employee in the performance of his duty under this act * * * shall be punished by imprisonment for a term of not less than six months * * * or by a fine of not less than $200.

The way to construe a statute is by what could be done under it, and this means that if a laborer employed in the Immigration Bureau was wheeling baggage along a wharf at Ellis Island, and a man should trip him, or anything of that sort, he would be impeding an immigration employee in the discharge of his duty; there would be no defense, he would have to be convicted, and this would require him to be punished by imprisonment for not less than six months, or by a fine of not less than $200. Now, that means that unless an offense is pretty serious the man will not be convicted at all.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman yield for a statement?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. HOUSTON. I want to state that the policy of the joint committee in preparing the criminal code was to abolish and do away with the minimum penalty, both as to fine and imprisonment.

Mr. BENNET. Always.

Mr. HOUSTON. For the purpose of more successfully enforcing the criminal law. In many cases a technical violation would require only a very slight punishment, and a fixed minimum fine or imprisonment would prevent the possibility of enforcing the law. We should extend a wise discretion to the courts, and I want to say that the provision to which I refer has been very highly commended by the Federal judiciary.

Mr. BURNETT. I understood the gentleman to say that the court imposes a penalty. That is not true of the fines, is it? The jury imposes the fine, does it not?

Mr. HOUSTON. In the Federal courts the court fixes the fine.

Mr. BURNETT. That is not the invariable rule, though, is it?

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; it is the invariable rule. The jury never fixes the punishment in the Federal court.

Mr. BURNETT. I believe it was an unwise change, but if that policy has been adopted by the codifiers of the Criminal Code, it is proper that it should be followed in this bill, however much I doubt the wisdom of the action of the codifiers heretofore. Under the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON] that that is the uniform policy in the new codification, I think the law ought to be uniform, and I accept the amendment. I understand it is the gentleman's intention to offer an amendment also making it apply to the minimum imprisonment.

Mr. BENNET. I have two additional amendments.

Mr. BURNETT. Along the same line?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. They may all be voted on at once.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 33, lines 4 and 5, strike out the words "less than $200 nor," and on page 33, line 9, strike out the words "less than one nor."

Mr. BENNET. I ask unanimous consent that the three amendments be voted on together.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the three amendments be voted on at one time. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, in line 5, on page 33, after the figures "$2,000," I move to insert the words "or both."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN: Page 33, line 5, after the figures "$2,000," insert the words "or both."

Mr. BURNETT. That is so it may be either fine or imprisonment or both.

Mr. MANN. Or both. If you strike out the minimum penalty, that ought to be inserted.

Mr. BURNETT. I think so.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. I move to strike out, in line 4, on page 33, the words "two years" and to insert "one year."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WILSON of Florida: Page 33, line 4, strike out the words "two years" and insert in lieu thereof the words "one year."

The CHAIRMAN. Is that amendment accepted?

Mr. BURNETT. In view of what the gentleman says about misdemeanors, I think that amendment ought to be accepted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I wish to take up the amendment that was passed by agreement awhile ago, and I ask unanimous consent that that amendment may be inserted on page 10, after line 23, instead of on page 20, line 16.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands this is in pursuance of an agreement made at the time.

Mr. BURNETT. Yes; when it was passed over.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It was passed over by agreement, and I want to ask now that it may be inserted at another place.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment. The Chair does not quite understand the gentleman's request.

Mr. MANN. He asks unanimous consent that the amendment which is now pending may be offered to section 3, instead of being offered as a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the amendment may be offered at the point indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington: Page 10, line 23, following the colon insert:

"That whenever any foreign country shall by statute, executive order, or otherwise exclude from its territory any class or classes of citizens of the United States upon grounds different from the grounds for excluding aliens from the United States herein specified, the same class or classes of aliens residing in said country shall be excluded from the United States so long as such exclusion of United States citizens continues."

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I think the words "Provided further" ought to be inserted at the beginning of the amendment. I do not know that I have anything further to say about the amendment.

Mr. BURNETT. In view of the statement made by the gentleman this morning as to the conditions up there on the Canadian side, I agree with him most heartily that that amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I agree with both gentlemen that the amendment ought to be adopted, but there is a question as to phraseology. I call the attention of the gentleman to this language. It is proposed in the amendment that whenever any foreign country shall by statute, executive order, or otherwise exclude from their territory any class or classes of citizens of the United States on grounds different from grounds on which we exclude aliens from the United States herein specified, and so forth. Ought not that to be "such foreign country"?

Mr. MANN. The meaning is that if any foreign country excludes American citizens going from this country to that country upon other grounds than we enumerate in this bill for aliens coming into this country, then we shall apply the same rule to their citizens coming here.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, in regard to the language of that amendment my impression is that the officials of Canada refuse to permit, under certain circumstances, citizens of this country to go into Canada, and they refuse also to permit Canadians who have come over here but who have not acquired citizenship to return to Canada.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not know whether that broad construction has been given to the order or not, but the order prohibits aliens, either of skilled or unskilled labor, going into that territory, and as a matter of fact many people have come to the United States from Canada, and when they attempted to return have been refused admission.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. The amendment of the gentleman from Washington does not cover that, because it speaks only of citizens of the United States, and the ones of whom I speak have not become citizens of the United States. They are residents and inhabitants, but not citizens.

Mr. MANN. We could not control foreign countries in regard to that; we could hardly put up restrictions on that ground.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. If for some reason we wished the emigrants to return, we can say that they shall return.

Mr. MANN. We could order them out of the country, but we could not force Canada to take them.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. If we wanted them to return, we could set up the same disqualifications for people coming to this country that they set up for people going to theirs; in other words, making it work both ways.

Mr. MANN. There is undoubtedly much force in what the gentleman says, but still I think it would be safer to let it stand with reference to our own citizens.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, on page 32, line 10, after the word "require," I move to insert the words "by subpœna." The paragraph as drawn does not state how the inspector may require the attendance and testimony of the witness.

Mr. BURNETT. I have no objection, but I think that would follow by whatever legal process was necessary, and there might be some other process than a subpœna.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The chairman will observe that further on it is intended that it should be by subpœna.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, is not there danger that by that amendment you will narrow the provision? He might be arrested instead of being served by subpœna.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman from California should know that an inspector would have no authority to arrest.

Mr. BURNETT. An attachment might be issued to bring him before the court.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman from Alabama knows that an inspector could not issue an attachment.

Mr. HAYES. What is the object of a subpœna if it has no force and if there is no power existing to enforce it?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman from California had had much experience in such matters, or in matters of that kind, he would not make that assertion. We can authorize any officer or inspector or clerk of a court to issue a subpœna, but that is as far as we can go. The subpœna is a well-recognized means of requiring the attendance of witnesses which is perfectly well understood. It means a certain form which is and ought to be generally used.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, we accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 17. That boards of special inquiry shall be appointed by the commissioner of immigration or inspector in charge at the various ports of arrival as may be necessary for the prompt determination of all cases of immigrants detained at such ports under the provisions of the law. Each board shall consist of three members, who shall be selected from such of the immigrant officials in the service as the Commissioner General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, shall from time to time designate as qualified to serve on such boards. When in the opinion of the Secretary of Labor the maintenance of a permanent board of special inquiry for service at any sea or land border port is not warranted, regularly constituted boards may be detailed from other stations for temporary service at such port, or, if that be impracticable, the Secretary of Labor shall authorize the creation of boards of special inquiry by the immigration officials in charge at such ports, and shall determine what Government officials or other persons shall be eligible for service on such boards. Such boards shall have authority to determine whether an alien who has been duly held shall be allowed to land or shall be deported. All hearings before such boards shall be separate and apart from the public. Such boards shall keep a complete permanent record of their proceedings and of all such testimony as may be produced before them; and the decisions of any two members of the board shall prevail, but either the alien or any dissenting member of the said board may appeal through the commissioner of immigration at the port of arrival and the Commissioner General of Immigration to the Secretary of Labor, and the taking of such appeal shall operate to stay any action in regard to the final disposal of any alien whose case is so appealed until the receipt by the commissioner of immigration at the port of arrival of such decision which shall be rendered solely upon the evidence adduced before the board of special inquiry. In every case where an alien is excluded from admission into the United States, under any law or treaty now existing or hereafter made, the decision of a board of special inquiry adverse to the admission of such alien shall be final, unless reversed on appeal to the Secretary of Labor: Provided, That the decision of a board of special inquiry shall be based upon the certificate of the examining medical officer and, except as provided in section 21 hereof, shall be final as to the rejection of aliens affected with tuberculosis in any form or with a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease, or with any mental or physical disability which would bring such aliens within any of the classes excluded from admission to the United States under section 3 of this act.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 19, page 34, the words:

All hearings before such boards shall be separate and apart from the public.

I am of the impression that no hearings in this country should be private and apart from the public, so that no one can be informed or succeed in obtaining information of what is transpiring before such a tribunal. I have objected to this provision before; and I can not help thinking that it is manifestly unfair to have these hearings in an excluded place, away from the public, depriving friends and relatives and the public from knowing what is occurring in those boards and what is being done by those inspectors.

The hearings as conducted, if they can be called hearings, closely resemble inquisitions, which type of persecution is practiced in only one country that I know of, namely, Russia. If the gentlemen of the House are of the opinion that we should follow the practice of that country, then the paragraph should remain as it is, and the hearings of these immigrants who are asking for admission to our shores should be kept strictly secret, or as the provision states, "separate and apart from the public." I can hardly believe that the majority of the Members now present are in favor of such a practice.

I wish to quote from the Report of the Immigration Commission of 1910 and set out here the words of the gentlemen who, after two years of study of the immigration question, advised against these secret inquisitions:

On page 32, volume 1, we find the following sentence:

The boards exercise a power which, if not properly used, may result in injustice to the immigrant or, through the admission of undesirable aliens, in harm to the country.

On the same page we find the following paragraphs:

At all the important ports the boards of special inquiry are composed of immigrant inspectors, who generally are without judicial or legal training. This, together with the fact that they are selected by the commissioners of immigration at the ports where they serve, tends to impair the judicial character of the board and to influence its members in a greater or less degree to reflect in their decisions the attitude of the commissioner in determining the case. The character of their decisions is indicated somewhat by the fact that nearly 50 per cent of the cases appealed are reversed by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, whose decision under the law must be based solely upon the evidence adduced before the board. This record of reversals on appeal suggests that their decisions which are not reviewed may be equally wrong. In justice to the immigrant, and to the country as well, the character of these boards should be improved. They should be composed of men whose ability and training fit them for the judicial functions performed, and the provision compelling their hearings to be separate and apart from the public should be repealed.

In view of the number and importance of these appeals from the boards of special inquiry and the amount of time and labor demanded of the Secretary and Assistant Secretary of Commerce and Labor, an additional assistant secretary should be authorized by Congress.

On page 46 we have the following direct recommendation of the commission:

To strengthen the certainty of just and humane decisions of doubtful cases at ports of entry, it is recommended: That section 25 of the immigration act of 1907 be amended to provide that boards of special inquiry should be appointed by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, and that they should be composed of men whose ability and training qualify them for the performance of judicial functions; that the provisions compelling their hearings to be separate and apart from the public should be repealed and that the office of an Assistant Secretary of Commerce and Labor to assist in reviewing such appeals be created.

Mr. Chairman, to me it is indeed amusing to see how frequently the chairman of the Immigration Committee [Mr. BURNETT] refers to the report of this Immigration Commission, and how frequently he points to the recommendation of the commission in regard to the literacy test, and how he extolls the work and care which the commission bestowed in the investigation of this problem.

Whenever he can find anything in the report which tends to sustain his position on the literacy test or other restrictive measures he loses no opportunity to impress the matter on the minds of the gentlemen of the House.

On the other hand, he can easily forget and omit to mention recommendations of the commission which have a tendency to aid the immigrant.

I believe that this provision should be eliminated, and I hope that the gentlemen of this House will vote to strike it from the bill.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, this has been the law for many, many years. It is not only in the interest of expedition of business at these ports, but it is in the interest of the alien himself. The alien comes here under embarrassing conditions and embarrassing environments, and to have a public hearing, with all the chattering and harangue that would take place, especially when the aliens from certain sections of the country are permitted there in unlimited numbers, would be really against the interest of the alien himself. Harm has not been done. It has been the law for many years, and it absolutely would be impossible for the department to conduct these examinations if it had to be in the open, under the conditions that would prevail at Ellis Island and the large ports. I hope that the amendment of the gentleman will not prevail.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the amendment for the purpose of calling the attention of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] to the fact that he and I, as members of the Immigration Commission, when we gave the matter full consideration came to precisely the same conclusion that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] now reaches. On page 32 of volume 1 of the Report of the Immigration Commission the gentleman and I said:

All hearings before boards are required to be separate and apart from the public, but a complete permanent record of the proceedings, including all testimony produced, is kept. The decision of any two members of the board shall prevail; but either the alien or any dissenting member of the board may take an appeal to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, and the taking of such appeal shall operate to stay any action in regard to final disposal of the case until it has been passed upon by the Secretary. At all the important ports the boards of special inquiry are composed of immigrant inspectors, who generally are without judicial or legal training. This, together with the fact that they are selected by the commissioners of immigration at the ports where they serve, tends to impair the judicial character of the board and to influence its members in a greater or less degree to reflect in their decisions the attitude of the commissioner in determining the cases. The character of their decisions is indicated somewhat by the fact that nearly 50 per cent of the cases appealed are reversed by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, whose decision under the law must be based solely upon the evidence adduced before the board. This record of reversals on appeal suggests that their decisions which are not reviewed may be equally wrong.

In justice to the immigrant and to the country as well the character of these boards should be improved. They should be composed of men whose ability and training fit them for the judicial functions performed, and the provision compelling their hearings to be separate and apart from the public should be repealed.

I think the gentleman and I were right, and we followed up that in the same set of conclusions on page 46 by making certain recommendations. We not only put it in our conclusions but in our recommendations, as follows:

To strengthen the certainty of just and humane decisions of doubtful cases at ports of entry it is recommended:

That section 25 of the immigration act of 1907 be amended to provide that boards of special inquiry should be appointed by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, and that they should be composed of men whose ability and training qualify them for the performance of judicial functions; that the provisions compelling their hearings to be separate and apart from the public should be repealed, and that the office of an additional Assistant Secretary of Commerce and Labor to assist in reviewing such appeals be created.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, from what report is the gentleman reading?

Mr. BENNET. From volume 1 of the Report of the Immigration Commission.

Mr. SABATH. That is the Immigration Commission that for nearly two years investigated conditions pertaining to immigration?

Mr. BENNET. Yes; there were nine of us, and we were men of very differing minds and habits of thought, but on this question of the boards of special inquiry, as on every other question, in fact, except the literacy test, we came to a unanimous conclusion, and the unanimous conclusion that we came to after two years of work was that this provision to keep these hearings separate and apart ought to be abolished, and one of the reasons for it was stated there that it was absolutely——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENNET. We thought it was absolutely repugnant to our institutions to have any form of a trial in a star chamber, and that when a man was on trial for the right to remain in the country of his choice that it ought not to be possible to have that man tried behind closed doors. We all agreed to it, the gentleman from Alabama as well as——

Mr. SHERWOOD. What was this commission to which the gentleman referred?

Mr. BENNET. This was the Immigration Commission, consisting of Senator LODGE, Senator DILLINGHAM, Senator Percy, Representative Howell, of New Jersey, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT], myself, Prof. Jenks, of Cornell University, William R. Wheeler, of San Francisco, and Mr. Neill——

Mr. SHERWOOD. And the commission reported unanimously?

Mr. BENNET. Unanimously.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman, I think, is correct in that statement. To a man who ever practiced law it was very abhorrent, there is no question, to have these secret hearings. I have investigated the matter very carefully since the report of the commission and have conferred time and time again with the officials of the Immigration Bureau, and reached the deliberate conclusion that it is not only impracticable as a matter of expeditiousness but that it was in the interest of the immigrant himself to have the hearing in this manner. Now, you take these people, especially along the Mediterranean Sea, excitable, mercurial people, to allow them to just come in at any time where some poor immigrant was being examined as to his admissibility, and in the interest of that immigrant himself I believe it would be an injustice to him, and hence I reached the conclusion, after a long deliberation, that the doors should not be thrown wide open to the public. In the first place, they will never get along with any business—it will be a handicap to them all the way through—and in the next place I believe it will be such an embarrassment to the immigrant himself to be confronted with all these people there that it will be absolutely and positively an injury to him.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. That is the law now?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. What in practice is the method adopted? Is the effect of this simply that he goes there before a whole lot of immigrants?

Mr. BURNETT. I will say to the gentleman that the practice, I am informed, is that an immigrant, his witnesses, and any near relatives come in, but they keep the general public out.

Mr. MANN. They do not let the other immigrants come in?

Mr. BURNETT. No.

Mr. MANN. I mean they do not have the hearing before the whole mass of immigrants?

Mr. BURNETT. They do not.

Mr. MANN. The story of one is not told to these others and made public?

Mr. BURNETT. No.

Mr. MANN. Is that the only purpose of it?

Mr. SABATH. There is no special secrecy about it. It is a rank inquisition; no American person is permitted to be present; no one can be there with the exception of the board, consisting of three members, an interpreter, and stenographer.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman himself ever attended any of these?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; and I could not secure admission except by a special permit from the Commissioner of Immigration at Ellis Island. I could not enter there although I was a Member of this House.

Mr. BENNET. And even the immigrant can not take some friend in there to help him?

Mr. COX. Can he take a lawyer?

Mr. SABATH. No; he can not——

Mr. MANN. If they would ever take a lawyer in they would never get through with it.

Mr. BURNETT. If you would ever take a lawyer there you would never get through with it at all, because there are always small lawyers there hunting for that kind of a job.

Mr. SABATH. I am not speaking in favor of their having the privilege of a lawyer, but I do believe that the immigrant should be permitted to have his brother or father or any relative whom he may desire to have there with him, when he is being quizzed or examined.

Mr. BURNETT. If it is the disposition on the part of the committee to amend this, they certainly ought not to turn this open to the general public. They will be doing the immigrant an injustice if they undertake to do it. If it is desirable to make any amendment at all, it ought to be an amendment to allow the immigrant to designate some friend or relative to be there with him.

You know those people; you have come in contact with them and their environments.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

Mr. COX. Does not the gentleman feel that the immigrant should have the right to select some one to go in there with him?

Mr. BURNETT. That is possible; and I would not object seriously to the immigrant being permitted to select some friend or member of the family, but we would not be treating the immigrant right if we opened up those investigations to everybody around there—that chattering crowd.

Mr. COX. Has not the gentleman been a prosecuting attorney in his own district?

Mr. BURNETT. No; I never was.

Mr. COX. I was prosecuting attorney, and we frequently had men and women come into the grand-jury room who were almost scared to death. You take a stranger there that does not know anybody at all, and it looks as if you were doing him an injury.

Mr. BURNETT. But you did not permit friends to come into a grand-jury room.

Mr. COX. I do not know but that I have.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, by eliminating this proviso it does not signify that we would throw the doors wide open, but we will eliminate the special proviso which makes these hearings private and exclusive, and they have certain rules over there that they can adopt, which will exclude the general public from the hearings. But an unfortunate man, who has traveled 3,000 miles and finally arrives here, is a stranger in a strange land, and if he is brought before this board he is scared to death. He can not answer half of the questions. He does not understand, and in a majority of the cases the interpreter does not understand the language of the man, and before he knows he is rejected or he is refused admission. I think it is manifestly unfair and unjust, and I believe that this amendment should prevail and this part should be stricken out.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment here that I think perhaps will meet the objections. I do not want to appear oppressive to these people. I feel that we ought to protect a man who comes in here, and offer him the protection of the Government. Very often unlimited access by the public is not a protection to the immigrant.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to perfect the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] yield to his colleague [Mr. SIEGEL]?

Mr. BENNET. I yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL] sends an amendment to the desk, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 34, line 20, after the word "public," insert the words "but the immigrant may have one friend or relative present who is not a lawyer."

Mr. SIEGEL. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think that just about covers the entire situation. Years ago, over at Ellis Island there was what was known as a group of lawyers who made a practice of preying upon immigrants who arrived there. That, however, has been abolished in recent years. All, I believe, that the immigrant who arrives here desires is to have some one who is acquainted with our institutions and knows our form of procedure to be present and advise him. It is for that reason that I have offered the amendment, and I have taken particular pains, therefore, to insert the provision that the immigrant should have a friend or relative, because such a person is deeply interested in his welfare. I do not think that lawyers are seeking to be present at these hearings for the sake of the compensation involved. When I say that, I am not reflecting upon the profession, because I have been a part and parcel of it for 14 years, and know that our standard is very high.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIEGEL. I will, with pleasure.

Mr. MANN. Suppose that the only relative or friend the immigrant had was a lawyer?

Mr. SIEGEL. That would be a most extraordinary case to arise over there.

Mr. BENNET. Here is the real difficulty, though: Now there are on the island 48 representatives of charitable and missionary societies, and the man who would give the best service to the immigrant, by and large, would be usually the representative of one of those societies. He speaks his language and everything of that sort. Now, it might happen, and I am not sure but in the case of the Hebrew Sheltering and Immigrant Aid Society the representative is a lawyer—Mr. Lipsitch—but I am not sure; I think some of the representatives are lawyers.

Mr. BURNETT. They may have others in the society. That is a large society, as I understand, but there are some others that are not large. The gentleman appreciates that the purpose I have is that I do not want these poor fellows who have $25 in their pocket to be exploited by that little crowd of shysters that would be around Ellis Island, and I am willing to do anything reasonable in order to prevent that. If the lawyer is really a relative of the immigrant, I would not care anything about it. All I want is that they shall not be there representing them as attorneys and exploiting them and extorting money from them.

Mr. BENNET. May I make this suggestion; that is, if they would strike out the part there "shall not be a lawyer," all the rest of it can be covered by regulation.

Mr. BURNETT. Say, "under such regulations as may be provided by the Secretary of Labor."

Mr. BENNET. All right.

Mr. SIEGEL. I accept that.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman modify his amendment, then?

Mr. MANN. Strike out the words "not a lawyer" and insert "under such regulations as may be prescribed."

Mr. SABATH. But this language should be eliminated: "All hearings before such boards shall be separate and apart from the public."

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; "under regulations to be prescribed by" whoever it is.

Mr. BURNETT. By the Secretary of Labor. It is under his jurisdiction, you know.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modified amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment: Page 34, line 20, after the word "public," insert "but the immigrant may have one friend or relative present under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Labor."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I am very much afraid that if this be passed and placed in the bill it will permit the fleecing of these men, and it will further permit articles to be published in newspapers every time a sad case appears—and every case that gets before the board is a sad case. The man who goes into that board, where there are already officials of the Government, and where a complete stenographic record will be made, will interfere with the proceedings, which are usually harsh and severe, and will run to the newspapers and start stories to the effect that there is a great state of affairs in that room, so that the people will think that the Government is engaged in a malicious inquisition. I am opposed to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I wish to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MILLER of Pennsylvania. Which last word is that? [Laughter.] On what page will you find that? [Laughter.]

Mr. BENNET. The last word of the section. I make that motion for the purpose of calling the attention of the chairman of the committee to what is being done in the proviso on page 35, lines 12 to 20. Under the practice, as it is at present, when a medical board makes a certificate that a man has a crooked finger, or anything of that sort, the board of special inquiry has that certificate before them, but they do not have to base their decision upon that certificate. They do not have to say that because a man has a crooked finger, therefore he is likely to become a public charge.

Now, it looks to me that under the language as it is amended, if the examining medical officer certifies that a man has a crooked finger, such as most of us who played baseball when we were young have, therefore he is likely to become a public charge, the board of special inquiry has nothing in the world to do but to find that the man is likely to become a public charge, because it says the decision of the board of special inquiry shall be based upon the certificate of the examining medical officer. Of course there is a provision there for an appeal, but there is a prior provision that all that can go up to the Secretary is what was before the board, and the Secretary must decide what was before the board, and what was before the board is the certificate. In other words, you absolutely abolish, so far as any effective purpose is concerned, the board of special inquiry whenever the surgeon makes a certificate. Now, I do not think that any President of the United States would ever sign a bill with that provision in it, and the gentleman possibly is interested in that part of it.

Mr. MILLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am satisfied that to strike out the last word, being the word "act," on line 20, page 35, could not possibly do what the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] desires. [Laughter.] I think it would be very ill-advised to strike out the word "act," in line 20, and I hope the amendment will fail. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York withdraws his pro forma amendment.

Mr. MANN. Just what difference does it make whether you insert "shall be" or leave it out? It is a mere grammatical expression. Is it not the law now that "the decision of the board of special inquiry, based upon the certificate of the examining medical officer, shall be," and so forth?

Mr. BENNET. That is all the difference in the world.

Mr. MANN. I do not see that it makes any difference whether you refer to a thing as based upon it or say that it shall be based upon it.

Mr. BENNET. If the gentleman will give me his attention for a minute, I will tell him how it will make a difference in practice.

Mr. MANN. It can not have worked out in practice, because there has been no practice. The gentleman is objecting to the words "shall be" in the bill. Is not that what I understand the gentleman's contention to be?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me it is a mere grammatical expression, which does not affect the meaning of the provision in the slightest degree.

Mr. BENNET. The existing law, as I recall it, is that the decision of a board of special inquiry, based upon the certificate of the examining medical officer, and so forth, shall be final.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BENNET. I ask unanimous consent for three minutes, so that I may answer the inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for three minutes to answer the question propounded by the gentleman from Illinois. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENNET. Under the present law the department has adopted a rule—and if I am not correct I want the gentleman from Alabama to correct me in this. This rule differentiates, as it has the right to do, and puts in the two classes—first, the class where the board of special inquiry acted solely upon the medical certificate; second, where they took the medical certificate and other evidence. Now, under this law as it would be with the words "shall be" included, the board of special inquiry could take testimony for a week and disprove absolutely everything that the doctors found, prove that their certificate was without foundation, and, nevertheless, the decision "shall be" based upon the certificate of the examining medical officer. No matter what the facts are, no matter what the proof is, the certificate governs.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, it is only made final under the existing law, so far as the language is concerned, when it is based upon that.

Mr. BENNET. Exactly, but under the law as proposed——

Mr. MANN. It means the same thing.

Mr. BENNET. No; but under the law as proposed they must base their decision upon the certificate. I could test that very easily by suggesting to the gentleman from Alabama that we drop out the words "shall be."

Mr. BURNETT. It must be based upon the certificate, because the whole thing is on the certificate.

Mr. BENNET. Is the gentleman willing to drop out the words "shall be"?

Mr. BURNETT. I do not think so. I think they are all right.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. GALLAGHER. If the words "shall be" cut no figure in there, what is the objection to striking them out?

Mr. BURNETT. If they cut no figure, what is the harm of leaving them in?

Mr. BENNET. Those words do cut a figure.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BENNET. I move to strike out the words "shall be," in line 13, page 35.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 13, page 35, strike out the words "shall be."

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 18. That all aliens brought to this country in violation of law shall be immediately sent back, in accommodations of the same class in which they arrived, to the country whence they respectively came, on the vessels bringing them, unless, in the opinion of the Secretary of Labor, immediate deportation is not practicable or proper. The cost of their maintenance while on land, as well as the expense of the return of such aliens, shall be borne by the owner or owners of the vessels on which they respectively came. That it shall be unlawful for any master, purser, person in charge, agent, owner, or consignee of any such vessel to refuse to receive back on board thereof, or on board of any other vessel owned or operated by the same interests, such aliens; or to fail to detain them thereon; or to refuse or fail to return them in the manner aforesaid to the foreign port from which they came; or to pay the cost of their maintenance while on land; or to make any charge for the return of any such alien, or to take any security for the payment of such charge; or to take any consideration to be returned in case the alien is landed; or knowingly to bring to the United States at any time within one year from the date of deportation any alien rejected or arrested and deported under any provision of this act, unless prior to reembarkation the Secretary of Labor has consented that such alien shall reapply for admission, as required by section 3 hereof; and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor that such master, purser, person in charge, agent, owner, or consignee has violated any of the foregoing provisions, such master, purser, person in charge, agent, owner, or consignee shall pay to the collector of customs of the district in which the port of arrival is located, or in which any vessel of the line may be found, the sum of $300 for each and every violation of any provision of this section; and no vessel shall have clearance from any port of the United States while any such fine is unpaid, nor shall such fine be remitted or refunded: Provided, That clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such question upon the deposit with the collector of customs of a sum sufficient to cover such fine. If the vessel by which any alien ordered deported came has left the United States and it is impracticable for any reason to deport the alien within a reasonable time by another vessel owned by the same interests, the cost of deportation may be paid by the Government and recovered by civil suit from any agent, owner, or consignee of the vessel: Provided further, That the Commissioner General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, may suspend, upon conditions to be prescribed by the Commissioner General of Immigration, the deportation of any aliens found to have come in violation of any provision of this act if, in his judgment, the testimony of such alien is necessary on behalf of the United States Government in the prosecution of offenders against any provision of this act or other laws of the United States; and the cost of maintenance of any person so detained resulting from such suspension of deportation, and a witness fee in the sum of $1 per day for each day such person is so detained, may be paid from the appropriation for the enforcement of this act, or such alien may be released under bond, in the penalty of not less than $500, with security approved by the Secretary of Labor, conditioned that such alien shall be produced when required as a witness and for deportation. No alien certified, as provided in section 16 of this act, to be suffering from tuberculosis in any form, or from a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease other than one of quarantinable nature, shall be permitted to land for medical treatment thereof in any hospital in the United States, unless the Secretary of Labor is satisfied that to refuse treatment would be inhumane or cause unusual hardship or suffering, in which case the alien shall be treated in the hospital under the supervision of the immigration officials at the expense of the vessel transporting him: Provided further, That upon the certificate of a medical officer of the United States Public Health Service to the effect that the health or safety of an insane alien would be unduly imperiled by immediate deportation, such alien may, at the expense of the appropriation for the enforcement of this act, be held for treatment until such time as such alien may, in the opinion of such medical officer, be safely deported: Provided further, That upon the certificate of a medical officer of the United States Public Health Service to the effect that a rejected alien is helpless from sickness, mental or physical disability, or infancy, if such alien is accompanied by another alien whose protection or guardianship is required by such rejected alien, such accompanying alien may also be excluded, and the master, agent, owner, or consignee of the vessel in which such alien and accompanying alien are brought shall be required to return said alien and accompanying alien in the same manner as vessels are required to return other rejected aliens.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TREADWAY: Insert, at the end of section 18, the following new paragraph:

"The Secretary of Labor shall cause to be examined papers of admission of all aliens at the expiration of three years from the date of admission. Within that period every male alien above the age of 21 years must file a supplemental affidavit that he has applied to the proper officials for citizenship, and will comply with the necessary requirements to become an American citizen. Any alien not furnishing such affidavit with proper evidence from a court having charge of naturalization within 6 months after the expiration of 3 years shall be notified of this provision of law by the Secretary of Labor, and if he fails to file affidavit within 30 days showing his intention of citizenship, he shall be deported under direction of the Secretary of Labor.

"This section is not applicable to diplomats or consular representatives, or to persons sent as the special representatives of their Government in any official capacity to the United States, or to persons coming as students to regular institutions of learning, a certificate to this effect having been filed with the original admission papers."

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that amendment that it is not germane to the bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. I understood the chairman yesterday that he did not think he would make the point of order when this was presented.

Mr. BURNETT. I remember I stated that to the gentleman, and I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, this amendment was offered yesterday, and the gentleman who was in the chair at the time considered it not germane to the paragraph on which I offered it. The idea which it contains is that a man above the age of 21 years, after he has resided for three years in this country, should declare his intention of becoming an American citizen or else should not remain in this country.

There are many, many thousands of aliens in this country who have been here an indefinite period of time. They have made use of the opportunities offered here for education and livelihood. They should become American citizens. I suppose the suggestion will be offered that it will prevent having in this country a class of people capable of doing the lower grades of manual labor. If at the expiration of three years these men have not assimilated enough of American institutions to want to become American citizens, it seems to me that there is no place for them here. They ought to return to the countries from which they came, and it seems to me right and proper that we should ask them to take upon themselves the responsibility of American citizenship if they are to receive its benefits and its opportunities.

We do not want to force citizenship upon them, but if they remain here in this country they ought to have obtained sufficient interest in our institutions to ask for the privileges and responsibilities of citizenship. I trust it will be made one of the provisions of our immigration law.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the gentleman who has proposed this amendment is under the impression that hardly any of these aliens make application for citizenship or even file declarations of intention to become American citizens. I wish to state that within the last year alone we have issued in the United States 96,390 certificates of naturalization.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Has the gentleman any statistics of the number of aliens that have been in this country three years or more and who have not applied for citizenship? That is the phraseology of the item, and one that I am interested in.

Mr. SABATH. It shows that a large number of them do. The figures which I have given only show the aliens who have actually prosecuted their petitions for final naturalization before the courts. There are thousands of others who, under the law, must wait from one to three years yet before they can ask for their final papers.

Mr. COX. Can the gentleman state about what per cent?

Mr. SABATH. Nearly all that can pass the examination. Of course, we have sections of our country where it is impossible for them to be naturalized. We have certain sections where nearly 40 per cent of those who make application are denied the privilege of becoming American citizens because they can not pass the examination to which they are subjected.

I wish to assure the gentleman, the proponent of this amendment, that the people are only too anxious and too desirous to become American citizens, especially those to whom he refers.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I will.

Mr. CULLOP. Of the number you represent as applying for citizenship last year, have you any data showing how many had been in this country more than three years at the time they made the application?

Mr. SABATH. No, I have not. The statistics which I have here I will read for the information of the House and the gentleman from Massachusetts. In 1909 there were 38,372 aliens naturalized. In 1910 there were 39,000. In 1911 there were 56,000. In 1912 there were 69,000. In 1913 there were 82,000. In 1914 there were 105,000.

This will show that the number of aliens who are desirous of becoming American citizens is increasing from year to year. We must take into account the fact that in 1907 there was a new naturalization law enacted which makes it rather hard for many of these people to become American citizens. The requirements are very stringent; they must know how to read and write; they must be familiar with the English language; they must know all about our Government; and as I stated yesterday, they are subjected to an examination that some Members of this House could not pass. Were it not for that fact a much larger number of these people would be naturalized.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. SABATH. I would like two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. SABATH. I want to assure you gentlemen that the great majority of these aliens are only too desirous and too anxious to go and file their declarations and after the lapse of the necessary time become American citizens. But we have some cases where people are working on the railroads or on farms and it is absolutely impossible for them to file their applications as speedily as those who reside in the cities.

Under the gentleman's amendment, these people who are working on the railroads or in the rural districts would suffer, rather than those who reside in the cities. You say that you want the immigrant to go to the farms and yet you penalize him for doing so.

I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts will not prevail.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am out of all sympathy with the suggestion of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts. It seems to me that American citizenship is a high privilege that should be sought and not forced on unwilling people. I can not but believe that citizens who are forced to become such are undesirable citizens. A man who shall have lived here for three years without coming to appreciate the fact that citizenship in the United States is a boon is not a desirable citizen to have.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman if he understands that the purport of the amendment is not to force citizenship on a man but to make him choose whether he prefers to be an American citizen or leave the country?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I understand it perfectly. It is enforced citizenship or deportation. That is the idea, is it not?

Mr. TREADWAY. That is correct.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think we have a right to deny people of other countries the right to come here and reside. They do not deny us that privilege, as I understand it, at least not in the more advanced countries. I would not deny it to them, and I would certainly rather have them residing here as aliens, earning their living and giving their labor for what they receive in the way of pay, without becoming citizens, than to have them become citizens by compulsion. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The Secretary of Labor was interviewed by a reporter of the Cincinnati Inquirer on the same proposition, and the question put to him was as follows:

"Should aliens, who come here to find work, be required to take out papers of naturalization?"

"I do not think so," Secretary Wilson answered. "The alien who becomes a citizen or takes steps to become a citizen should do so freely and not under any sort of compulsion. He should want to be an American, should believe in our institutions, and love liberty. Such a man will make a good citizen and his children will be patriotic Americans. It would be no gain to the country were he forced to accept citizenship; on the contrary, it would be a hurt.

"Furthermore, if entrance to the United States were conditional on citizenship, nothing could prevent an alien from applying for his first papers, thus signifying his intention, and then refusing later to complete the required process. Fraud would be encouraged and we should be making a mockery, as I see it, of a sacred privilege."

Mr. Chairman, I agree with the Secretary of Labor. I say that to force men to become citizens of this country without due regard or appreciation on their part of what our institutions stand for, of what our country has endeavored to achieve, and of our history, would indeed be a mockery. I say further, Mr. Chairman, that the passage of such an amendment to this bill would be in violation of the treaties, the gentleman's agreement, and the conventions that exist between the United States and the Governments of Europe and Asia. I go a step further and say that the adoption of such a provision would undoubtedly be declared unconstitutional. We would be endeavoring, in fact, to compel men of other nations who have the right to come and reside here, to become citizens or else threaten them with deportation. What would become of our boasted freedom and what kind of a new citizenship would we have if we were to adopt such an amendment? I desire to see aliens become citizens as quickly as the law permits, but I think more of the future of my country and I therefore urge the defeat of the amendment as being in contravention of American principles and detrimental to our best interests.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, in my judgment the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] ought not to be adopted. My feeling in this matter and the reasons for my opinion have been very well expressed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN]. I think citizenship ought not to be forced upon people coming to this country. It ought to be a matter of choice with them and not of compulsion. I think the result would be if the amendment offered by the gentleman were adopted, and it should become a part of our law, that undesirables would become citizens.

I have in mind another matter which I think would make it undesirable to have this enacted into the law. These men seeking to become citizens have to make application and present themselves before a court. They have to show certain qualifications, and if the court were aware of the fact that the alternative to a favorable action on an application were deportation it might influence its action and cause it to act favorably upon the application and admit the applicant to citizenship when otherwise the application would be refused. For the reasons that have been so well stated by the other gentlemen, and for those which I have feebly suggested myself, I believe the amendment ought not to be adopted.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], in opposing this proposition, read to us the number of aliens who have been naturalized. Out of a million, practically, that landed on our shores annually, less than a hundred thousand have become naturalized per annum. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL] has quoted from the present Secretary of Labor, Mr. Wilson, in this connection. I desire to call his attention to the fact that the present Secretary of Labor and the present Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Redfield, as Members of this House voted for the literacy test and voted to pass the Burnett bill over President Taft's veto.

If there is a sound proposition here, it is the one contained in this amendment. Why should we not require of these aliens, when they come here to enjoy the opportunities in a new country, that they should identify themselves with us as a people? They come here and they share in our liberties, the opportunity to earn a living and to care for themselves and their families. They take advantage of our public free-school systems to educate their children at public expense, and they utilize our public hospitals for their sick and insane.

But there is the proposition that they will not become Americanized and will not accept American citizenship, but hold themselves in reserve, when there is a foreign war, to leave our shores and fight for a foreign country.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Not at this time. It is one of the most serious objections in the minds of millions of American people to this constant flow of immigration that a million people come here annually to make this their new home, with absolutely no interest at all in becoming American citizens. I was on a subcommittee which investigated the Colorado strike, and I took occasion to ask many of the strikers and strike breakers—and 90 per cent of them were aliens—how long they had lived in America and if they had taken out naturalization papers, and almost without exception they admitted they had never taken the first step toward becoming American citizens. We had some on the stand who had resided in America for 11 years who had made no effort to become American citizens. We ought to compel them to become citizens or return to their foreign homes. If they remain, and our country should become involved in a war, our Government should have the right to demand their services in defending the country. They have come here to share in the benefits of a free country, and they owe it to themselves and to this Government, which provides a new home for them, to lose no time in identifying themselves and becoming American citizens, to bear their just part in aiding, defending, and building up the country which protects and cares for them in war and in peace. I am surprised that any Member of this House would stand in the way of a movement looking to requiring these people to do what plain, simple, ordinary honesty and justice should demand of them. [Applause.]

Mr. GALLAGHER. Will the gentleman yield to a question now?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Is it not possible that there is a difference between the figures stated by my colleague [Mr. SABATH] in reference to naturalization papers and those who come here and declare their intention?

Mr. AUSTIN. There may be. I have seen the statement that only 20 or 25 per cent of the Italians coming to this country make any attempt at becoming American citizens.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I oppose this amendment because I think it will be a species of duress on these people. I do not believe in hothousing or forcing men to become citizens, and I believe they are bad citizens when forced to become such; and I would rather see them be birds of passage, coming and going, than to have the toga of American citizenship placed upon this class of people by a species of force. That is my objection to it. I believe that a man who comes here for the purpose of settling and helping to build up the material prosperity of our country, like the great Germanic people, the people from the British Isles, the people from the Scandinavian countries, and other countries, is going to seek citizenship voluntarily; but when you meet that low class from southern Europe—Sicilians, people from south Italy, the Greeks, Syrians—and Mexicans and hold them up by saying, "You are going to be sent back to your country if you do not become an American citizen," you are forcing a bad people into citizenship. [Applause.] Gentlemen, there is the objection I have to it. I am not objecting to this on the grounds of my distinguished friend, Judge SABATH, and others, but I am opposing it because I believe it would be against the interests of American citizenship, and therefore I do not believe that class of people ought to be hothoused into citizenship, or that for one moment, as intimated by my friend from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] that they will love our flag, the Stars and Stripes, when we force them either to become citizens or go back to their own country, and I am more afraid of them when they become American citizens without any instinct of American patriotism in their hearts than I would be afraid of them as birds of passage, coming and going to other countries. [Applause.]

Mr. AUSTIN. If they are not worthy to be citizens ought they to be kept in this country?

Mr. BURNETT. Well, now, by this bill, when it passes, many of the undesirables will be kept out, and, gentlemen, it is going to pass—already the Chicago Tribune, the Philadelphia Inquirer, and many other great metropolitan newspapers of the country have foreshadowed the danger there will be unless it passes, and it will pass. I hope and pray that there may be no veto over which it must pass, but if there be a veto, Mr. Chairman, although I have the most profound respect for the great man who presides in the White House, the people of this country are demanding that this bill, or some more stringent measure, pass, and it will pass at this session unless it is hung up in the Senate, and it will become a law and keep lots of these people out. [Applause.]

Let us not hothouse them into citizenship, because they are unfit for citizenship if they must have that kind of legal or political duress held over them in order to force them to become citizens.

Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BURNETT. I make a motion that all debate be now closed.

Mr. TREADWAY. That is hardly fair.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state the point of order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Did not the Chair recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania before he observed the gentleman from Alabama?

The CHAIRMAN. I proposed to recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania when the gentleman from Alabama asked a question, and I asked the gentleman if he desired to make a motion. As chairman of the committee, I recognized him in preference to anyone else. I did not formally recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understood the Chair had formally recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. No. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] moves that all debate close on this amendment.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 59, noes 14.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and seven Members are present, a quorum.

The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 36, line 11, after the word "to" insert before the word "pay" the words "fail to."

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I think the chairman will see that that amendment is not necessary. There is a patent omission there. If he will look on line 9, page 36, he will see that the language there is "fail to," and on line 10 it is "fail to." Therefore, on line 11, it should be "fail to." And unless those words are put in, the provision will be, what the gentleman did not mean, that it shall be unlawful for any master, purser, person in charge, and so forth, to pay the cost of their maintenance while on land.

Mr. BURNETT. There is no doubt but that that is a clerical error. The word "fail" ought to be in there.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the amendment.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] has been sweeping the deck so clear on the strength of resolutions of one kind or another that have come to him during the last 10 years, that I think it is important to say to the committee that there are some other people who do not agree with him. Of course he has resolutions from patriotic societies and a great many from labor organizations, but apparently the gentleman from Alabama has not taken into consideration the women who are organized in this country. It may be that the women have not the right to vote in his State, and, therefore, it amounts to little when the question of suffrage arises, but the good women of the country understand the moral side of this question and the perpetuation of the household probably appeals to them.

I have in my hand a letter which I think the gentleman from Alabama has had, but which he has not been good enough to read into the RECORD up to the present time. It comes from the legislative department of the General Federation of Women's Clubs of the United States. Let me read in part so as not to take up all of my five minutes:

PITTSBURGH, PA., March 27, 1916.

The General Federation of Women's Clubs, which is one of the largest organized bodies of women in the world, having a membership of more than 2,000,000 women, has authorized me, as the chairman of its department of legislation, to oppose the literacy test in the Burnett immigration bill.

I have made this statement to Mr. BURNETT by letter some time since, but I desire to remake it, and make it to one who will publicly state this opposition to the House and have it noted in the RECORD.

I wish also to add that the general federation is not an organization that indiscriminately approves or disapproves of any particular piece of legislation as many associations do, simply because they are requested so to do. On the contrary, we exercise the greatest care in our indorsement of or opposition to bills. But we have steadfastly opposed this literacy test, because we believe it to be both unjust and unwise.

Very respectfully, yours, LUCY DORREY IAMS.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the gentleman from Alabama has taken peculiar pleasure on several occasions in referring to the fact that the Philadelphia Inquirer has apparently changed front on this question of literacy and has indorsed his proposition to that extent. He gleefully quotes from it because it is a Republican newspaper, published in a great Republican city, and he likes to rub it in a little bit, and cram it down the throats of the Representatives from the great Pennsylvania city.

Now, why does he not quote from some Democratic newspapers from the same State? I could produce the Philadelphia Record, a Democratic paper, which takes the other view, also the Philadelphia Ledger, but I do not care to go into those details now. I could not do it in five minutes, anyhow. But I do want to quote briefly from one of the great Democratic organs of the State of Pennsylvania, and thus meet the gentleman from Alabama on his own ground. I shall quote from the Pittsburgh Post, which I think is as stalwart a supporter of the President of the United States as is the New York World, which some think the distinguished gentleman from Missouri, the Speaker of the House, referred to when he said that "President Wilson had the world by the tail."

The Pittsburgh Post, this Democratic Pennsylvania paper, says:

IMMIGRANTS EAGER TO LEARN.

News in the cosmopolitan department of the Post and reports from the school authorities of the city are of peculiar interest in connection with the coming vote in the lower branch of Congress this week on the proposed "literacy test" for immigrants. They show eagerness on the part of the immigrants in this busy district to learn English and prepare for American citizenship. What any of them lack in requisites of a common education when they arrive is being made up with encouraging rapidity.

Think of it—this is a Democratic newspaper in opposition to the Democratic chairman of a Democratic committee, coming from the Democratic State of Alabama. I read further:

This shows the unfairness and the shortsightedness, from the standpoint of a land of opportunity and one greatly in need of labor, of a literacy test that would deny opportunity to the individual trying to better his condition and which would at the same time interfere with the progress of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Alabama is holding up the progress of the country, according to his own organ in Pittsburgh.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is all in the same tone; and I shall ask leave, Mr. Chairman, to extend it in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] desire recognition?

Mr. BURNETT. The amendment offered by the gentleman was adopted, was it not?

Mr. BENNET. No. The committee has to adopt it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURNETT. Line 13 is the same, I believe.

Mr. FESS. There are two other omissions.

Mr. CULLOP. In lines 14 and 15 there is the same omission of the word "fail" as was pointed out in line 11 on page 36. The gentleman had the words "fail to pay." And then on line 12 it should be "fail to make any charge," or "fail to take any security," on line 13.

Mr. BENNET. Oh, no. The gentleman should go back to line 5 on page 36, "that it shall be unlawful for any master, purser, or person in charge, agent, owner, or consignee of any such vessel * * * to make any charge."

Mr. BURNETT. We do not want to fail there.

Mr. CULLOP. It is unlawful to fail to make it.

Mr. BENNET. You want it to be unlawful to take any security? I should be very glad personally to see the words "fail to" in there, but I think the gentleman from Alabama would object.

Mr. BURNETT. That is not intended.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 38, line 16, strike out "a" where it occurs before the word "medical" and insert the words "and examining," so that the line will read "That upon the certificate of an examining medical officer," etc.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, if I can have the attention of the chairman of the committee, in another portion of the bill it is provided that the medical examination shall be conducted by officers of the United States Public Health Service except in certain contingencies, and the Secretary is authorized to employ physicians who have had not less than four years' experience.

Now, if the language is left in the bill as it is, it does not confer any authority upon the certificate of one of those surgeons who is not a medical officer of the United States Public Health Service. The amendment which I have suggested makes the line read:

Provided further, That upon the certificate of an examining medical officer.

Now, if you are going to make a man an examining medical officer, his certificate ought to have exactly the same weight as a similar certificate of any other examining medical officer.

Mr. BURNETT. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I do this for the purpose of continuing a few observations with reference to the comments of the Pittsburgh Post, a Democratic newspaper, which is opposing the Burnett immigration bill. The chairman of the committee has had considerable satisfaction in quoting the Philadelphia Inquirer upon several occasions, because it has seemingly swung into line for the Burnett bill; and therefore, in order to keep him up to date, I recur to the Pittsburgh Post, a Democratic paper, which stands true to its opposition to the literacy test. When my first five minutes expired, I was reading from an editorial from that paper, which at the point where I left off read something like this:

This shows the unfairness and the shortsightedness, from the standpoint of a land of opportunity and one greatly in need of labor, of a literacy test that would deny opportunity to the individual trying to better his condition and which would at the same time interfere with the progress of the country. If the immigrants performing work in our industries that calls for brawn rather than literacy were suddenly withdrawn from the mills, the plants would be obliged to close for a time, throwing many thousands of other workers out of employment. But the schools established for the education of the immigrants in American ways show that there is no selfishness that would hold the aliens down to illiteracy.

This, I think, the gentleman from Alabama ought to be informed upon, because it gets to the crux of the situation. I read:

The record shows that as soon as they have capacity for advancement they are advanced, their old places going to the newcomers; the rate of industrial expansion in this country guarantees employment for the able-bodied immigrants about as rapidly as they arrive. This holds throughout the land; but owing to the great industries here that are constantly attracting alien labor, Pittsburgh is a conspicuous example in Americanization work.

In addition to classes in citizenship conducted in connection with the public-school system there are classes in English for the beginners, and the resort to them, as pointed out, shows the keenest appreciation of the opportunities. The social-center work also appeals strongly to the aliens, many of the women receiving instructions through it not only in English, but in domestic science. Adding to these opportunities provided under American auspices must be recalled the work of the numerous societies of the foreign-born residents, particularly in music. They preserve traditions of their native lands that are generally admired and add to the richness of our national life. That the great majority of them teach loyalty to the adopted country is shown by the number of their members ready to volunteer to fight for the United States at any sign of danger to it.

With such educational forces at work here the immigrant who is illiterate when he arrives is soon placed on a better foundation. The Congressmen advocating a literacy test are at least in need of some practical education.

Mr. Chairman, all this comes from a Democratic authority, which has in mind the needs of the country, the needs of the labor market, the welfare of humankind in general. It recalls in particular the attitude of President Woodrow Wilson upon this question and desires to see that his hands shall be upheld and sustained by this House in this as in other instances. The attitude of this Democratic authority justifies an appeal to the gentleman from Alabama to change his course of action and permit worthy and deserving immigrants to come into the United States without being penalized or thrown back into the thraldom of Europe because they have the misfortune to be unable to read. I commend this high Democratic authority to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I do not wonder that the gentleman goes into conniption fits every time we read something from his home paper in favor of restriction and therefore goes a thousand miles away from my home to get something that he thinks fits my case. Here is another good one from his home paper—the Philadelphia Inquirer—this morning. It seems that every day they are trying to get the gentleman to swing around into the reform corps that has been forming here for the last few days. Here is what they say about it now:

WHY BRING IN MORE ILLITERATES?

"Do we find illiteracy in this country?" asked Representative KAHN, of California, in a speech opposing the literacy test in the immigration bill. "Of course we do," was his answer to his own question. "Let us sweep our own doorsteps before we talk of illiteracy in other parts of the globe."

Now, here is what the gentleman's paper says:

A poor argument, that. How are we going to keep our own doorsteps clean if litter is constantly gathering on them? If we have illiterates—and we have—why let in all other illiterates that the world produces?

Put the literacy test in the immigration bill and it would settle at once the Chinese and Japanese coolie question. That alone would be worth while.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for a friendly question?

Mr. BURNETT. Certainly. All the questions between us are friendly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the Philadelphia Inquirer has evil designs upon the Democratic Party. It is a good, strong Republican paper, and it fears you may put this question up to the President of the United States and compel him to reverse himself. That is what it is trying to avoid.

Mr. BURNETT. Is that the question the gentleman wants to ask?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Alabama that there is an amendment pending.

Mr. BURNETT. That is what I was addressing myself to.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn; and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURNETT. Now, Mr. Chairman, in order to carry out the agreement that we made a section or two back, I move to insert, on page 36, line 24, after the word "provisions," the words "or any of the provisions of section 15 hereof"; and, on page 37, line 3, I move to strike out the words "this section" and insert in lieu thereof the words "said sections."

I think that meets the difficulty that was passed over some time ago.

Mr. BENNET. May we have those amendments reported?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send his amendments to the desk and they will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 36, line 24, after the word "provisions," insert the words "or any of the provisions of section 15 hereof."

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama and myself have only the same purpose in connection with this. It takes a moment to see how this fits in.

Mr. BURNETT. That was prepared by the law officer of the department.

Mr. BENNET. He is a pretty good law officer, but, after all, we are the Members of Congress. May we have the amendment reported again?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be reported again.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. BENNET. Right on first blush I rather think that that is a proper amendment

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 37, line 3, strike out the words "this section" and insert in lieu thereof the words "said sections."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 38, line 17, strike out the words "of the United States Public Health Service."

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the chairman of the committee that that simply is perfecting the amendment that I offered, and I do not think he will have any objection to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 38, line 23, strike out "a" and insert "an examining."

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, an examining medical officer is a very important officer, but he can not examine literary questions. Therefore it seems to me it might be pertinent to read a few lines from the Washington Post of this morning. It is as follows:

THE LITERACY TEST.

With strange persistence the House of Representatives again attempts to bar the gates of the United States to honest, able-bodied immigrants by imposing a literacy test. In the face of history and in spite of the repeated reminders of patriotic Presidents of both parties, the House clings to the notion that immigrants unable to read and write are not fit material to enter the United States.

The pressure for this legislation comes from men who were themselves immigrants not long ago, and who would now shut the door through which they entered. They would monopolize the opportunities of America under the pretext of purifying the stream of immigration. They stand directly athwart the pathway of progress, and would call a halt to the march of millions of honest and hard-working aliens who have in them the stuff of which America is made.

How can immigration be purified by a language test? Will it keep out Black Handers, and poisoners, and anarchists, and birds of prey generally? There is no pretense that book learning makes for morality or that lack of it implies criminality. No one has had the hardihood to suggest that if an anarchist were unable to read he would be more criminal than he is. The literacy test is not set up as a moral sieve, but is intended merely to restrict immigration without regard to its moral quality. It is a device for excluding good and bad, indifferently, for the benefit of those already in. It is supposed that it will make labor scarcer and therefore raise wages.

The United States needs more labor if it is to develop and meet the needs of an increasing population. Illiterate immigrants do not remain illiterate long, and even while illiterate they are good workers. Probably the proportion of shirkers is smaller than among immigrants who have absorbed the vicious socialistic stuff dealt out to the submerged tenth in Europe. Immigrants do not make up the majority of meddlesome agitators in this country. The worst offenders, who would wreck the Constitution and introduce crazy schemes of reform, are pure-bred Americans, like those who rule in Kansas and Oregon. The average immigrant finds the United States so far ahead of the old country that he is willing to take his chances without wasting his time in inventing improvements in government.

If Congress should pass the literacy test, it is to be hoped that the President of the United States will knock it squarely out with a veto, and thus keep the doors open to the deserving of other lands, without regard to their lowliness and previous lack of opportunity.

Mr. BURNETT. Has the gentleman from New York any other amendments to offer?

Mr. BENNET. On this particular section I have one more, and that is formal.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment is already pending; and the question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 38, line 24, strike out the words "of the United States Public Health Service."

Mr. BENNET. That is the same thing, I will say to the Chairman.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent for two minutes on this amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say, in reference to the editorial read by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] from the Washington Post opposing the illiteracy test, that about 8 or 10 years ago Congress authorized the creation of a commission composed of nine members to investigate the immigration question. The Member from New York [Mr. BENNET] was on that commission, along with eight other very able and distinguished Members of both Houses of Congress and private citizens. They spent four years investigating and traveling over foreign lands from which we are receiving immigration. They spent in round numbers about a million dollars, and the testimony, reports, and so forth, cover 42 volumes. That commission, by a vote of 8 to 1, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] being the exception, recommended this identical legislation, the literacy test, in order to keep out undesirable immigrants. That is my answer to the editorial quoted from the Washington Post by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I have frequently wondered how the gentleman from Tennessee, who is often heard on the floor of this House arguing wisely and prudently, can speak so recklessly and incorrectly the moment the question of immigration is projected before the House. For that reason I am again obliged to call his attention to the fact that this Immigration Commission to which he has alluded as being appointed about 15 years ago, was not appointed until 1907, or only a little over 8 years ago. It was during Mr. Roosevelt's Republican administration, and no doubt the gentleman will remember in what a deplorable condition the country was at that time. We not only had a general business depression and hard times, but a real Republican panic.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Would the gentleman like to hear what the Federal Commission on Industrial Relations reports as to those conditions now, and the need for this bill?

Mr. SABATH. You will remember that at the time the commission was appointed and began its work, business was at a standstill and thousands upon thousands of men were out of work. It was of conditions prevailing at that time and in the years 1908 and 1909 that the commission was speaking. Those conditions do not prevail under this Democratic administration. Work is now plentiful, the country is prosperous, and the laboring men are in demand all over the country, under this Democratic administration. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. AUSTIN. Is it not a fact that when the President vetoed this former bill there were 4,000,000 people idle and unemployed and that the mayor of New York, Mr. Mitchell, reported that there were 500,000 in that city out of employment?

Mr. SABATH. Again the gentleman is mistaken as to the figures. There may have been quite a few out of work in the centers of population, but this was also partly due to the fact that many laborers were coming in from the summer work on the farms and also the fact that certain industries, such as the building trades, can not operate in the winter. It is also a fact that there was a conspiracy on foot, on the part of the railroads and the moneyed interests, to browbeat the Congress into sidestepping the revision of the tariff and the Interstate Commerce Commission into increasing the railroad rates. Under the leadership of President Wilson the Democratic Congress has enacted legislation which has secured for this Nation and the people of this country the greatest period of prosperity that we have ever witnessed. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. AUSTIN. Making ammunition to kill these people in Europe. That is what the prosperity is.

Mr. SABATH. That statement of the gentleman is again only about 5 per cent correct, and if I had my way very little of it would be manufactured for export or for our own use.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. GALLAGHER. I want to read a little notice taken from the Washington Herald of March 17, 1916:

WILMINGTON NEEDS WORKERS.

That 100 men and an equal number of women are wanted in a Wilmington, Del., factory immediately is announced in a letter sent the Washington Board of Trade by the chamber of commerce of the town. The letter declares Wilmington has exhausted the supply of its unemployed and that the factory is in dire need of the extra workers. Good wages are assured.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. What kind of a factory is that?

Mr. SABATH. I do not know what the gentleman from Washington is driving at, but I do know that what applies to Wilmington applies to Chicago and to every section of our country. Laborers are in demand, work is plentiful, and the country is prosperous. This notwithstanding the fact that the gentleman from Washington and perhaps his colleague, the gentleman from Tennessee, for political reasons would like to see it otherwise.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10384, the immigration bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

CENTENNIAL OF COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
UNITED STATES COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY,
Washington, March 28, 1916.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives,
The Capitol, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: You are no doubt acquainted with the fact that the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey is celebrating its centennial by appropriate exercises on April 5 and 6, 1916.

These exercises will take place on the above dates at the new National Museum.

I am inclosing herewith a program, and you will observe that those who are to take part in this celebration are men of prominence.

On behalf of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey I wish to extend an invitation to the Members of the United States House of Representatives to attend the sessions at the new National Museum and also the exhibit in the same building.

I am, respectfully, yours,

E. LESTER JONES,
Superintendent.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 4476. An act to amend an act to authorize the Dauphin Island Railway & Harbor Co., its successors or assigns, to construct and maintain a bridge, or bridges, or viaducts, across the water between the mainland at or near Cedar Point, and Dauphin Island, both Little and Big; also to dredge a channel from the deep waters of Mobile Bay into Dauphin Bay; also to construct and maintain docks and wharves along both Little and Big Dauphin Islands, as amended by an act approved June 18, 1912; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 8493. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 13043. An act making appropriations to supply further additional urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1916 and prior fiscal years; and

H. R. 13768. An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the Military Establishment for the fiscal year 1916.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair finds on the Speaker's table the bill (S. 43) in relation to the location, entry, and patenting of lands within the former Uncompahgre Indian Reservation, in the State of Utah, containing gilsonite or other like substances, and for other purposes, which was inadvertently referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. The chairman of that committee has reported to the Speaker that it does not belong to his committee. Without objection the bill will be re-referred to the Committee on Public Lands, where it properly belongs.

HOUR OF MEETING THURSDAY NEXT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-morrow it adjourn to meet at 10.30 o'clock on Thursday, in order to take up the immigration bill and finish it as soon as possible.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-morrow it adjourn to meet at 10.30 a. m. on Thursday. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. That is with the understanding that the immigration bill does not come up to-morrow.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; the immigration bill does not come up to-morrow.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is there not a possible way by which we could agree to take up the bill to-morrow?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; to-morrow is Calendar Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. There is one way in which it could be taken up, and that is by a vote of two-thirds of the Members to dispense with the proceedings in order on Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. MANN. But that would not bring this bill up to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The Chair investigated the matter this morning, and the rule itself provides that the bill shall be in order any day except Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. SABATH. Would it not be possible to postpone Calendar Wednesday until Thursday?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman could get two-thirds of the House to vote with him he could postpone the day and do away with it.

Mr. MANN. But it would not bring up this bill.

The SPEAKER. That could be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. The rule provides for convening at 11 o'clock. Would this unanimous-consent order be overturned by that rule?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina that when the House adjourns to-morrow it adjourn to meet at 10.30 o'clock Thursday next?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the subject of the bill H. R. 13768, the appropriation bill which we passed this morning.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly, at 6 o'clock and 13 minutes p. m., the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 29, 1916, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Hellen S. Waste, widow of John P. Waste v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 948); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of William A. Ryan v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 949); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of August Reimers v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 950); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Melissa Redfearn, niece of Jeremiah Redfearn, deceased, v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 951); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

5. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Frank W. Perry v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 952); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

6. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Marcellus J. W. Holter v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 953); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

7. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of John H. Hayes v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 954); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

8. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Horace B. Boyd, son of Samuel S. Boyd, v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 955); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

9. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Nettie J. Peake, daughter of Thomas D. Elliott, deceased, v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 956); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

10. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Caroline S. Mindil, Katrina W. Westbrook, and Amy I. Pfouts, children and sole heirs of Henry J. Sheafer, deceased, v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 957); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

11. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Mary M. Thornton, widow of John W. Thornton, deceased, v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 958); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

12. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Frank M. Duke v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 959); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

13. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Imogene T. Fisher, widow of Newton D. Fisher, deceased, v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 960); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

14. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Reuben L. Fox v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 961); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

15. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of John C. Gilmore v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 962); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

16. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting draft of a bill to authorize and direct the Secretary of the Treasury to enlarge, extend, remodel, and improve the Federal building at Harrisonburg, Va., for the better accommodation of the post office and other governmental offices (H. Doc. No. 963); to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and ordered to be printed.

17. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Acting Secretary of State submitting an estimate of deficiency in the appropriation for the International Radiotelegraphic Conference for the calendar year 1915 (H. Doc. No. 964); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. SULLOWAY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6911) to amend section 4747 of the Revised Statutes relating to pensions, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 443), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 29, 1916.

(Legislative day of Tuesday, March 28, 1916.)

The Senate reassembled at 12 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I ask that House bill 12766, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, be proceeded with.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays the bill before the Senate.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 12766) to increase the efficiency of the Military Establishment of the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hollis	Overman	Sutherland
Bankhead	Hughes	Page	Swanson
Beckham	Husting	Phelan	Taggart
Borah	James	Pittman	Thomas
Brandegee	Johnson, S. Dak.	Ransdell	Thompson
Catron	Jones	Shafroth	Tillman
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Sheppard	Townsend
Clapp	Kern	Sherman	Vardaman
Clark, Wyo.	McCumber	Simmons	Wadsworth
Culberson	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ga.	Walsh
Curtis	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Mich.	Warren
Dillingham	Myers	Smoot	Weeks
Gallinger	Norris	Sterling	Works
Harding	Oliver	Stone

Mr. KERN. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. He is absent on official business. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

THE SUGAR INDUSTRY.

Mr. SIMMONS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to ask unanimous consent out of order to submit a report from the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SIMMONS. On behalf of the Committee on Finance I report back favorably with an amendment the bill (H. R. 11471) to amend an act entitled "An act to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," approved October 3, 1913, and I submit a report (No. 317) thereon. This is the bill commonly known as the sugar bill, and I report it with the recommendation that it be passed as proposed to be amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

NATIONAL-PARK SYSTEM.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask unanimous consent out of order to present a series of resolutions from the Gilpin County Metal Miners' Association and the Clear Creek County Mining Association, of Colorado, protesting against a further extension of the national-park system to the domain of that State. I move that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

DESERT-LAND ENTRIES IN RIVERSIDE COUNTY, CAL.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield, but I should like very much to proceed with the pending measure before the Senate.

Mr. WORKS. I wish to ask for the present consideration of Senate bill 4671, which is on the calendar. It is an urgent matter.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am willing to yield to that if it does not lead to discussion. I am familiar with the bill, and I think it ought to be attended to promptly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill (S. 4671) to exempt from cancellation certain desert-land entries in Riverside County, Cal.?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, let us know what the bill is before we give our consent to its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. That seems to be a rather complicated matter and it requires some explanation, at least. I am rather constrained to object.

Mr. WORKS. If the Senator will allow me to explain it, I think he will not object to its present consideration. It involves the cancellation of a number of entries on desert land and simply extends the time in order to allow the entrymen to procure water for the land. If the bill is not passed, their rights will be forfeited. Therefore it becomes a very important matter.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator state whether there was any division in the committee that reported the bill?

Mr. WORKS. None at all; and it is recommended by the Secretary of the Interior, in order to protect the rights of these desert-land entrymen.

Mr. SIMMONS. And it is necessary to pass it before the 1st day of May?

Mr. WORKS. Yes, sir; it is.

Mr. SIMMONS. As there was a unanimous report of the committee and it is recommended by the department, I withdraw my objection.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments, on page 2, line 3, before the word "Riverside," to insert "in," and on the same page, line 15, after the word "May," to insert "first," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That no desert-land entry heretofore made in good faith under the public-land laws for lands in townships 4 and 5 south, range 15 east; townships 4 and 5 south, range 16 east; townships 4, 5, and 6 south, range 17 east; townships 5, 6, and 7 south, range 18 east; townships 6 and 7 south, range 19 east; townships 6 and 7 south, range 20 east; townships 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8 south, range 21 east; townships 5, 6, and sections 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 18, and 19, in township 7 south, range 22 east; township 5 south, range 23 east, San Bernardino meridian, in Riverside County, State of California, shall be canceled prior to May 1, 1919, because of failure on the part of the entrymen to make any annual or final proof falling due upon any such entry prior to said date. The requirements of law as to annual assessments and final proof shall become operative from said date as though no suspension had been had. If the said entrymen are unable to procure water to irrigate the said lands above described through no fault of theirs, after using due diligence, or the legal questions as to their right to divert or impound water for the irrigation of said lands are still pending and undetermined by said May 1, 1919, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to grant a further extension for an additional period of not exceeding two years.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NATIONAL DEFENSE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12766) to increase the efficiency of the Military Establishment of the United States.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I desire to say that it had been my purpose to address the Senate on the subject of the military policy of the United States from colonial times until this present bill. It would not have taken very much time, but it would have taken more time than I thought I ought to consume at the expense of the business of the Senate. It seems to me that the people of the country are demanding results rather than a discussion of these questions, and for that reason I have concluded not to undertake to address the Senate at length on the subject, but to confine myself to this particular measure that has been reported from the Senate Committee on Military Affairs.

That there has been inefficiency in the military system of the country, Mr. President, goes without saying.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, can we have order, so that we may hear what the Senator from Oregon is saying?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It does not disturb me, Mr. President.

Mr. BORAH. It disturbs me, because I am interested in what the Senator is saying.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair for three years has been requesting order in the Senate, and has not secured it yet.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I was remarking that there has been inefficiency in our military policies and systems since the earliest colonial times goes without saying, Mr. President, and there is no better evidence of that fact than that Washington, as commander of the forces during the Revolution, judging from the records, seems to have spent most of his time in writing letters to the Continental Congress and in appealing to them for some assistance in the way of the creation of an efficient army for the purposes of the Revolution. His appeals fell upon deaf ears, because practically at no time were his requests upon the Continental Congress complied with. There was a division of responsibility between the State authorities and the National Government which rendered the Continental Army at all times more or less inefficient, and not until the Continental Congress of the United States, in the final days of the Revolution, vested in Washington almost absolute power and authority was he able to control the situation which confronted him.

From that time until this recommendations have been made by distinguished Secretaries of War and by distinguished Army officers to the Congress of the United States, pointing out not only the inefficiencies but suggesting methods by which they might be avoided and by which some relief might be granted. Gen. Knox, one of the earliest Secretaries of War—in fact, the first after the Revolution—formulated a plan for the organization of an efficient army, but no action was taken upon it. Subsequent to his time other Secretaries of War and other distinguished officers and retired officers of the Army have formulated plans for the organization of the armed forces of the United States, both the Regular troops and the militia, but I believe none of those recommendations have been at any time more than partially complied with.

In 1912 the then distinguished Secretary of War, who gave this subject very great consideration—I refer to Mr. Stimson—called upon the General Staff to formulate a policy and to report upon the organization of the land forces of the United States. On the 10th of August, 1912, he embodied that report in a printed document, and in it he said:

> The accompanying report of the General Staff on the organization of the land forces of the United States contains the broad outlines of a comprehensive military policy. The General Staff has been directed to proceed with a detailed study of the plan with a view of securing specific recommendations for the executive and legislative action necessary to carry the policy into effect. During the progress of this work notes and suggestions with a view of perfecting the policy are invited, and for this purpose the report is published for the consideration of the Army, the National Guard, and all others who are interested in the development of a sound military policy for the Nation.

That document was published, and it was pretty generally considered by all those who were interested in a military policy for this country, but nothing was done by Congress.

Some of the suggestions which were made by the General Staff at that time have been embodied in the law from time to time in the way of riders on appropriation bills; and I want to say, Mr. President, that nearly all the military legislation of this country that has been curative and that has been effective has been enacted by placing riders on appropriation bills, where they have no place whatsoever. But there seemed to be no other way to correct the inefficiency that existed in the military system of the country.

The Senate will probably remember that in the Sixty-third Congress the distinguished then Secretary of War, Mr. Garrison, asked me to introduce for him several measures, all intended to perfect the military system of the country and to cure defects which existed therein, and it was hoped that eventually these bills might be attached as riders to the Army appropriation bill. My position then, Mr. President, with the Secretary of War and my position since has been that these military appropriation bills are not intended to carry general legislation. I differed from the Secretary of War about that and insisted that he ought to have a measure formulated by those experts of the Army who are capable of doing the work, place it in the form of a statute, and submit the matter to Congress, so that the responsibility for the enactment of a proper military policy should be placed upon the Congress of the United States by the suggestion of one consistent and perfected measure that the Congress could act upon.

The result was that nothing was done with that piecemeal legislation, Mr. President, but the Secretary of War very properly did this: He called upon the General Staff to take up for consideration the report which had been made by Mr. Stimson, and to extend it to the present time. What was done by the General Staff and the War College was very properly also embodied in a report, which I have before me, and it states:

> This appendix consists of the statement of proper military policy, prepared by the War College division of the General Staff Corps in response to orders issued to them in the month of March, 1915, to prepare and submit a complete and exhaustive study on this subject. This statement, with its accompanying estimation of cost, was submitted to me—

That is, to Secretary of War Garrison—

> on the 11th day of September, 1915, and transmitted to you—> on September 17, 1915, together with my own final recommendation in the premises.

That is, the President of the United States—

Mr. President, that report, which was at that time submitted by the Secretary of War to the President September 17, 1915, is an extension of the report which was formulated by the General Staff under the administration of the War Department by Mr. Stimson. I am not going to read the report, but I am going to read just the first statement of it, so that the Senate may see, when this bill has been read, that the bill follows in the main all of the suggestions which were embodied in the report and the extension of the report of 1912.

I particularly call the Senate's attention to this, because, if Senators will observe the reading of the bill, they will find that while the Military Committee may have disagreed as to numbers in the report probably both as to the enlisted personnel and as to the officers, we have followed the general outlines which have been recommended by an expert body of men.

> The substance of this policy will, therefore, be a clearly and succinctly expressed statement, with the reasons therefor, of a proper military policy for the United States, for the organization of—
> I. (a) The Regular Army; (b) the Organized Militia.
> This should be followed by—
> II. A careful study of the question of a reserve for both the Regular Army and the Organized Militia and, if possible to agree upon it, a plan for the formation of such reserves.
> III. The Volunteers: Their organization and relation to the Regular Army and the Organized Militia.
> IV. Reserve material and supplies which should be available and which can not be promptly obtained if delayed till the outbreak of war.

Of course this committee did not have anything to do about that in this bill, because that comes on the supply bills in another measure.

> The Secretary of War is of the opinion that a statement which shall contain everything that is pertinent to the foregoing subjects will inform Congress of all the essential things that the best judgment of the War Department thinks it is justified in asking Congress to provide in peace and to be prepared to provide in war. These things, being such as commend themselves to the general military intelligence, if they do not so commend themselves there can be no policy such as is now aimed at, may be assumed to be those that will be asked for by succeeding administrations of the War Department—at least, they will indicate the general line of development to be pursued. Such a statement will constitute what he has in mind as a comprehensive military policy.
> There are many other things that will from time to time be asked of Congress or, when authority exists for it, that will be done without asking legislation. Such things may be requests for appropriations to build new posts in view of the abandoning of others; the concentration of the Army in a smaller number of posts in definite areas of the country; projects for promotion, retirement, etc.; plans for training the Army and the militia, etc.
> Such things have no part in the statement of a general military policy which the Secretary of War now desires to have prepared, and, in order to save time and labor and to concentrate attention upon that which is essential, he desires any such extraneous matter to be eliminated from the study which he has directed.

That is a brief résumé, Mr. President, of the line of policy that was laid down by the War College, and it is the line which has been followed very largely by this committee in the consideration of a military policy.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. In laying down the principles of the General Staff and of the then Secretary of War, I do not understand that they indicate the extent to which the Army should be increased. Am I misinformed about that?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It practically recommends the strength of the Army.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What was the maximum strength of the Army which they recommended? I do not in asking the question desire to divert the Senator from the course of argument he wishes to pursue.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They recommended something near half a million with the colors and in the reserves, as I now recall.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And what is the plan as now proposed by the Senator from Oregon and his committee?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the Senator from Michigan will allow me to proceed in regular order, I think I shall get all that before the Senate; but I will now say that the maximum proposed by the Senate bill, or, rather, the House bill as proposed to be amended by the Senate committee, is 250,000 of the regular force; but the number of troops provided for in the bill, exclusive of the Quartermaster Corps and the Hospital Corps, is about 178,000. I will say to the Senate that I think I shall get the answers to most of the questions which are likely to be asked me before the Senate in the course of my statement, and then, after I have made the statement, I shall be very glad to attempt to answer anything which Senators may desire to ask.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon, before he proceeds, clearly state what he means by the maximum of 250,000, and yet that the bill only provides for 178,000?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. We put that—178,000 men—as the minimum strength of the Army.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But that could be increased to 250,000?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It could be increased to 250,000 without any further legislation.

Mr. President, I desire to ask to have printed as a part of my statement in this matter the "Statement of a Proper Military Policy for the United States," of date September, 1915. It is not very long and it will itself answer a great many questions which will be asked about the matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

STATEMENT OF A PROPER MILITARY POLICY FOR THE UNITED STATES.

[Prepared by the War College Division, General Staff Corps, in compliance with instructions of the Secretary of War, March, 1915.]

APPENDIX C.

This appendix consists of the Statement of Proper Military Policy, prepared by the War College Division of the General Staff Corps, in response to orders issued to them in the month of March, 1915, to prepare and submit a complete and exhaustive study on this subject. This statement, with its accompanying estimation of cost, was submitted to me on the 11th day of September, 1915, and transmitted to you on September 17, 1915, together with my own final recommendation in the premises.

WAR COLLEGE DIVISION.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF,
Washington, September 11, 1915.

Memorandum for the Chief of Staff:
Subject: Military policy.

1. Memorandums from your office, dated March 11 and March 17, 1915, directed the War College Division to make a complete and exhaustive study of a proper military policy for the United States, and to prepare a clearly and succintly expressed statement of the policy, basing it, in a general way, upon the "Report on the Organization of the Land Forces of the United States, 1912," "eliminating everything that is not necessary for the easy and quick comprehension of the military policy, and adding anything which may be necessary to afford such comprehension."

2. The following extract from the memorandum of March 17, 1915, gives the subjects which the "statement" was to cover, viz:

"The substance of this policy will, therefore, be a clearly and succintly expressed statement, with the reasons therefor, of the recommended strength and organization of—

"I. (a) The Regular Army;
(b) The Organized Militia."

This should be followed by—

"II. A careful study of the question of a reserve for both the Regular Army and the Organized Militia and, if possible to agree upon it, a plan for the formation of such reserves.

"III. The Volunteers: Their organization and relation to the Regular Army and the Organized Militia.

"IV. Reserve material and supplies which should be available and which can not be promptly obtained if delayed till the outbreak of war.

"The Secretary of War is of the opinion that a statement which shall contain everything that is pertinent to the foregoing subjects will inform Congress of all the essential things that the best judgment of the War Department thinks it is justified in asking Congress to provide in peace and to be prepared to provide in war. These things, being such as commend themselves to the general military intelligence (if they do not so commend themselves, there can be no policy such as is now aimed at), may be assumed to be those that will be asked for by succeeding adminstrations of the War Department—at least, they will indicate the general line of development to be pursued. Such a statement will constitute what he has in mind as a comprehensive military policy.

"There are many other things that will from time to time be asked of Congress or, when authority exists for it, that will be done without asking legislation. Such things may be requests for appropriations to build new posts in view of the abandoning of others; the concentration of the Army in a smaller number of posts in definite areas of the country; projects for promotion, retirement, etc.; plans for training the Army and the militia, etc.

"Such things have no part in the statement of a general military policy which the Secretary of War now desires to have prepared, and, in order to save time and labor and to concentrate attention upon that which is essential, he desires any such extraneous matter to be eliminated from the study which he has directed."

3. Following these lines, the accompanying "Statement of a Proper Military Policy for the United States" was prepared.

4. It is proposed to supplement this paper later with memoirs on such subjects as require more detailed discussion than would be appropriate to this paper.

M. M. MACOMB,
Brigadier General, Chief of War College Division.

INTRODUCTION.

THE MILITARY PROBLEM CONFRONTING THE UNITED STATES.

1. The evolution of national military policies: National policies are evolved and are expanded as the Nation grows. They reflect the national sense of responsibility and also the national ambitions. They constitute the doctrine underlying acts of statesmanship and diplomacy. A nation's military policy is the national doctrine of self-preservation. The world is never without virile, capable, and progressive nations, the circumstances of whose development have imbued them with the belief that their vital interests demand an active aggressive policy. They are forced to resort to universal service in the effort to fulfill, at any cost, what they conceive to be their destiny. In the United States the development of the Nation has proceeded under an environment so favorable that there is no well-defined public opinion in regard to what constitutes an adequate military policy. Heretofore isolation, combined with the necessity of preserving the balance of power, has been a sufficient guaranty against strong hostile expeditions from Europe or Asia. The safeguard of isolation no longer exists. The oceans, once barriers, are now easy avenues of approach by reason of the number, speed, and carrying capacity of ocean-going vessels. The increasing radii of action of the submarine, the aeroplane, and wireless telegraphy all supplement ocean transport in placing both our Atlantic and Pacific coasts within the sphere of hostile activities of oversea nations.

The great mass of the public does not yet realize the effect of these changed conditions upon our scheme of defense.

Another thing that militates against the evolution of a sound military policy for our country is the erroneous conclusion drawn by the people from our past experiences in war. In developing such a policy victory is often a less trustworthy guide than defeat. We have been plunged into many wars and have ultimately emerged successfully from each of them. The general public points to these experiences as an indication that our military policy has been and still continues to be sound. That this is not really the belief of those in authority is shown by the fact that each war of importance has been followed by an official investigation of our military system and the policy under which it operated. The reports of these investigations give a startling picture of faulty leadership, needless waste of lives and property, costly overhead charges augmented by payment of bounties to keep up voluntary enlistments, undue prolongations of all these wars, and finally reckless expenditure of public funds for continuing pensions. These documents supply convincing proofs that all such shortcomings have been due entirely to a lack of adequate preparation for war in time of peace. But we have not yet learned our lesson. It has never been driven home by the bitterness of defeat. We have never known a Jena or a Sedan. At no stage of our national life have we been brought face to face with the armed strength of a great world power free to land sufficient forces to gain a foothold at any desired portion of our coasts. That we have to some extent felt this danger is evidenced by our efforts to provide a navy as a first line of defense and to supplement it with the necessary harbor fortifications; but we have not yet realized that our ultimate safeguard is an adequate and well-organized mobile land force. Experience in war has shown the need of these three elements, but the public has not yet demanded that they be perfected, coordinated, and combined in one harmonious system of national defense. Not until this has been accomplished will a proper military policy for the United States be adopted.

2. Our abiding national policies: The majority of our people have always believed in asserting their own rights and in respecting those of others. They desire that the cause of right should prevail and that lawlessness should be crushed out. To live up to these high ideals imposes upon us new duties as a world power; duties that require something more positive than a policy of mere passive defense. In addition, there are two underlying and abiding national policies whose maintenance we must consider as necessary to our national life. These are the "Monroe doctrine" and the policy of avoiding "entangling alliances." They are distinctive and affect our international relations in a definite manner. In addition, policies may develop in the future as a result of international relations with respect to trade conditions.

A general consideration of our responsibilities as a Nation and of our geographical position indicates that the maintenance of our abiding policies and interests at home and abroad involves problems of defense measures both on land and on sea. The solution of the general problem of national defense must be sought in the provision of adequate land and sea forces and a consideration of their coordinate relationship.

3. Coordinate relationship of Army and Navy: Upon the Navy devolves the solution of the problem of securing and maintaining control of the sea. To accomplish this it must be free to take the offensive promptly—that is, to seek out and defeat the enemy fleet. The use of any part of the high-sea fleet for local defense defeats the chief object of the Navy and is a misuse of naval power. A fleet defeated at sea and undefended by an adequate army is powerless either to prevent invasion or even its own ultimate destruction by combined hostile land and naval forces. In illustration compare the cases of the Spanish Fleet at Santiago and the Russian Fleet at Port Arthur with the present example of the German, Austrian, and Turkish Fleets under the protection of land forces.

Upon the Army devolves the task of gaining and maintaining on shore the ascendency over hostile land and naval operations. To accomplish this it must be able to seek out promptly and to defeat, capture, or destroy the invader wherever he may attempt either to secure a footing upon our territory or to enter the waters of our harbors with the objective of threatening the destruction of the seaport or of a fleet driven to seek refuge or repair therein.

The problems involved in operations against hostile land forces are complex and include only as an incident the protection of harbor defenses on the land side. The problems of harbor defense against attack from the sea are simple and passive in their nature.

4. Coordinate relationship of statesman and soldier: In our country public opinion estimates the situation, statecraft shapes the policy, while the duty of executing it devolves upon the military and naval departments.

Such a doctrine is sound in direct proportion to its success in producing a military system capable of developing fighting power sufficient to meet any given national emergency, at the proper time, supported by all the resources, technical and economic, of the country, in a word—preparedness. All the other world powers of to-day have realized the necessity of maintaining highly trained and organized military and naval forces in time of peace, and all, or nearly all, are allied in powerful coalitions.

Without superiority on the sea or an adequate land force there is nothing to prevent any hostile power or coalition of powers from landing on our shores such part of its trained and disciplined troops as its available transports can carry. The time required is limited only by the average speed of its vessels and the delay necessarily consumed in embarking and disembarking.

In order that the American people can intelligently decide on a doctrine of preparedness which shall constitute the military policy of the United States, and that Congress and the Executive may be able to carry out their decision, information concerning the military strength of other great nations and shipping available for transport purposes must be clearly set forth.

The work of the statesman and of the soldier and sailor are therefore coordinate; where the first leaves off the others take hold.

5. Preparedness of the world powers for over-sea expeditions: Control of the sea having been once gained by our adversary or adversaries, there is nothing to prevent them from dispatching an over-sea expedition against us. In order to form an idea of the mobile force we should have ready to resist it an estimate must first be made of the approximate number of troops that other nations might reasonably be expected to transport and of the time required to land them on our coasts.

The number of thoroughly trained and organized troops an enemy can bring in the first and succeeding expeditions under such an assumption is a function of—

(a) The size of the enemy's army; and

(b) The number, size, and speed of the vessels of the enemy's merchant marine that can be used as transports.

Should our enemy be a nation in arms—that is, one in which all or nearly all of the male inhabitants of suitable physique are given a minimum of two years' training with the colors in time of peace (and this is true of all world powers except ourselves and England), it is evident that the size of the first expedition and succeeding expeditions would be limited only by the number of vessels in the transport fleets. It also follows that as the capacity and number of steamers in the merchant marine of any nation or group of nations increase in the future, the number of trained soldiers which such nation could send in such expedition will also increase, and our trained forces should be correspondingly augmented.

What the conditions were in August, 1914, is shown in the following table, which may be regarded as a reasonable estimate:

Preparedness of the great powers for over-sea expeditions.

Nation.	Strength of army.	Tonnage available of ships with capacity over—			First expedition using 50 per cent of tonnage given.		Second expedition using 75 per cent of tonnage given.		Time needed to—

[1] 240,000 territorials.

[2] Japanese field regulations indicate the intention to use steamers of 1,000 tons; for this reason and because of the large amount of steamers between 10 and 12 knots speed, all Japanese steamers over 10 knots speed and a thousand tons gross have been considered.

[3] Fifty per cent has been assumed as the figure representing the amount of shipping in or within call of home ports at outbreak of war.

NOTE.—The allowance prescribed in our Field Service Regulations of 3 tons per man and 8 tons per animal for ships over 5,000 tons and 4 tons per man and 10 tons per animal for vessels under 5,000 tons has been used in estimating the capacity of ships, except where the regulations of any country prescribe a different allowance. These allowances include rations, water, forage, etc., for the voyage and a margin for three months' reserve supplies. The tonnage allowance covers men, animals, and all accessories and is sufficient to provide for vehicles (including guns).

Fighting power is the result of organization, training, and equipment backed by the resources of the country. Available shipping is a matter of commercial statistics.

The quality, organization, and efficiency of these troops, except those of Japan, which demonstrated their excellence in the Russo-Japanese War, are now undergoing a supreme test of military strength on land and sea. In addition, where certain nations have transported troops by sea their capabilities in this respect have to some extent been shown. This test by the ordeal of battle is visibly demonstrating their organization, their fighting power, and the rate at which each is capable of developing and maintaining its military strength.

This evidence, produced under conditions of actual warfare, presents an example of the resultant efficiency of any nation that has developed a sound military policy—the soundest policy being the one which insures a successful termination of the war in the shortest time.

6. Statement of the military problem: From what has been stated we are forced to the conclusion that we must be prepared to resist a combined land and sea operation of formidable strength. Our principal coast cities and important harbors have already been protected by harbor defenses which, by passive method alone, can deny to an enemy the use of these localities as bases for such expeditions.

The enemy being unable to gain a foothold in any of these fortified areas by direct naval attack, will therefore be forced to find some suitable place on the coast from which land operations can be conducted both against the important coast cities and the rich commercial centers in the interior. Long stretches of coast line between the fortified places lie open to the enemy. The only reasonable way in which these localities can be defended is by providing a mobile land force of sufficient strength, so located that it may be thrown in at threatened points at the proper time.

It has just been shown what the strength of these expeditions might be, as well as the time required for any one of them to develop its whole effective force. Hence it can be seen, when we take into consideration the possible two months' delay provided by the Navy, that our system should be able to furnish 500,000 trained and organized mobile troops at the outbreak of the war and to have at least 500,000 more available within 90 days thereafter. Here, however, it must be pointed out that two expeditions alone will provide a force large enough to cope with our 1,000,000 mobile troops, and consequently we must at the outbreak of hostilities provide the system to raise and train, in addition, at least 500,000 troops to replace the losses and wastage in personnel incident to war. To provide this organized land force is the military problem before us for solution.

I. THE REGULAR ARMY.

GENERAL FUNCTIONS OF THE REGULAR ARMY.

7. In the endeavor to reach a just conclusion as to the strength and organization of a Regular Army, adequate to play its part in our national defense, it must not be forgotten that this defense is a joint problem requiring for its correct solution the united efforts of both Army and Navy, and that the ultimate strength of the greater war army is dependent to a considerable extent upon the part to be played by the fleet. It is therefore assumed in this discussion that the Navy is preparing to place and maintain in the Pacific, when the occasion requires, a force superior to that of any oriental nation, and, in the Atlantic, one second only to that of the greatest European naval power.

The Regular Army is the peace nucleus of the greater war army of the Nation. Its strength and organization should be determined not only by its relation to the larger force, but by its own peace and war functions. It must be prepared at all times to meet sudden and special emergencies which can not be met by the army of citizen soldiers. Its units must be the models for the organization and training of those of the great war army.

Some of the functions of the Regular Army are:

(a) To furnish the entire strength of our garrisons outside of the United States proper both in peace and war.

(b) To garrison our harbor defenses within the United States proper in time of peace.

(c) To furnish detachments of mobile forces in time of peace sufficient for the protection of these harbor defenses and naval bases against naval raids which, under modern conditions, may precede a declaration of war.

(d) To furnish sufficient mobile forces to protect our principal cities by preventing the landing of hostile expeditions for their capture in the intervals between our fortified harbors or near such cities.

(e) To supply a mobile reserve to reenforce our garrisons outside of the United States proper during periods of insurrection and disorder.

(f) To furnish expeditionary forces for minor wars resulting from the occupation of foreign territory where treaty rights or fundamental national policies may have been threatened.

(g) To prepare in advance its existing administrative and supply departments for the equipment, transportation, and supply of the great war army of the Nation.

(h) To assist in the training of organizations of citizen soldiers.

8. Concerning the strength and organization of the Regular Army, the following points are to be considered:

(a) At the outbreak of war the Regular Army at home should be strong enough, with the addition of organized and trained citizen soldiers, to form the first line of defense in order to give sufficient time to permit the mobilization and concentration of our greater war army, and to seize opportunities for such immediate initial operations as may be undertaken before the mobilization of the army of citizen soldiers can be completed.

(b) It should be so organized and located that it can be economically and efficiently trained, quickly and easily mobilized and concentrated, and readily used as a model in the education and training of the citizen forces.

MOBILE AND COAST ARTILLERY TROOPS AND THEIR FUNCTIONS.

9. Experience has shown that our regular land forces and others modeled upon them must consist of two distinct classes, i. e.:
(a) Mobile troops.
(b) Coast Artillery troops.
These two groups have their own special functions for which they are trained and equipped and from which they should not be diverted except in some emergency.

The function of the Coast Artillery is to man our harbor defenses designed to protect important seaports from direct naval attacks and raids from the sea. The armament and accessories of these forts are intended to be so complete and powerful as not only to prevent hostile landings at all places within range of the guns, but also to cover all navigable waters in the vicinity of great seacoast cities so thoroughly as to leave no dead spaces from which enemy ships, either at anchor or during a run-by, could bring them under bombardment. While these harbor forts are important elements in our scheme of defense, they are, nevertheless, powerless to prevent invasion at points outside the range of their guns. The total length of our coast line is enormous, and the stretches covered by harbor defenses are and must remain very small compared with the unprotected intervals that lie between them. If we should lose command of the sea an invader would simply land in one of these intervals. It therefore follows that the ultimate defense of our coasts depends upon defeating a mobile army of invasion, and this can be done only by having mobile forces prepared to operate in any possible theater of war. At this stage of hostilities the problem becomes one of cooperation between Coast Artillery and mobile troops, but there can be no fixed relation in the strength of these two classes of land forces. The necessary strength of Coast Artillery troops depends upon the number and character of harbor defenses established; that of mobile troops upon the nature and extent of the defensive and offensive operations for which the Nation decides to be prepared.

RELATION BETWEEN HOME AND OVER-SEA GARRISONS.

10. The most rational method of determining the proper strength and organization of the Regular Army is based upon the fact that this force is and must be divided into two distinct parts—one for over-sea service; the other for home service. Each of these parts must have its proper quota, both of mobile and Coast Artillery troops.

The troops on over-sea service consist of the detachments required to meet the special military problems of the Philippines, Oahu, Panama, Alaska, Guantanamo, and Porto Rico. Each of these detachments has a distinct tactical and strategic mission, and is to operate within a restricted terrain. All of them are limited to over-sea communication with the home country, and all of them may therefore be isolated for considerable periods, especially in the critical first stages of war. It is obvious that under these circumstances these detachments should be prepared to meet all military emergencies until reenforcements from the United States can reasonably be expected. They must, therefore, be maintained at all times at full statutory strength, and must, in addition, be organized with the view to being self-supporting, preferably during the continuance of war, or at least until the Navy has accomplished its primary mission of securing the command of the sea.

The force at home is on an entirely different basis. It may or may not be given an adequate strength in time of peace, but it is supported by all of the resources of the Nation. It may be increased at the pleasure of Congress, and it may be reenforced by considerable forces of citizen soldiery. It follows from these considerations that the Military Establishment of the United States in time of peace should first provide effective and sufficient garrisons for the political and strategic outposts of the United States, and that the residue at home should be organized with the view to ultimate expansion into such war forces as national interests may require.

GENERAL REQUIREMENTS OF OVER-SEA SERVICE.

11. The Philippines: A decision to defend the Philippines against a foreign enemy is a matter of national and not of military policy. But in studying the military requirements of such defense it must be remembered that, under conditions of modern warfare, unless our Navy has undisputed control of the sea, we can not reenforce the peace garrison after a declaration of war or while war is imminent.

12. Oahu: The maintenance of the naval base at Pearl Harbor, Oahu, is an essential factor in the military problem of holding the Hawaiian Islands. These islands constitute a vital element in the defense of the Pacific coast and in securing to ourselves the full value of the Panama Canal as a strategic highway between the two oceans.

The problem of holding the Hawaiian Islands can be solved by making Oahu, and therefore Pearl Harbor, secure against all comers. A satisfactory solution requires the joint action of the Army and Navy. Pearl Harbor and Honolulu are already protected from direct naval attack by fortifications, now nearing completion. These, while deemed adequate to meet the conditions existing when they were designed, must now be strengthened to meet the recent increase in power of guns afloat; but no matter how complete these harbor fortifications on the southern coast of Oahu may be, they are unable to prevent attacks either on the remaining hundred miles of coast lying beyond the range of their guns or on the other islands of the group. Consequently there should be in addition a force of modern submarines and destroyers forming part of the permanent naval equipment of Pearl Harbor with sufficient radius of action to keep the Hawaiian waters thoroughly patrolled throughout their whole extent and to make them dangerous for enemy vessels. Should this force be worsted in combat and withdrawn before the arrival of our high-sea fleet, the complete control of the local waters might pass temporarily to the enemy, so that the ultimate security of both Honolulu, the naval base at Pearl Harbor, and, indeed, of the whole group, depends upon including in the Oahu garrison enough mobile troops to defeat any enemy that may land anywhere on the island. It is clear that perfect coordination between the Army and Navy at this station is absolutely essential to success in holding this key to the Pacific. Unless we provide such dual defense of the Hawaiian Islands we can not be sure of retaining control even of that part of the Pacific lying within the sphere of defense of our western coast. By making such provision the high-sea fleet is left free to seek out the enemy fleet in Pacific waters.

13. Panama: The Panama Canal is a very important strategic position which it is our duty to hold. By our control of this highway between the two oceans the effectiveness of our fleet and our general military power is enormously increased. It is therefore obvious that the unquestioned security of the canal is for us a vital military need. The permanent garrison should be strong enough to guard the locks, spillways, and other important works and to prevent a naval attack which, under modern conditions, may even precede a declaration of war. We should, therefore, be able, even in peace, to man the seacoast guns and mine defense that cover the approach to the canal, and we must have enough mobile troops to defeat raids. A modern fleet might land a small raiding party of several thousand bluejackets at any one or more of a number of places, and such a force landing out of range of the seacoast guns could, if unopposed, penetrate to some vulnerable part of the canal within a few hours. The permanent garrison should, therefore, include a mobile force strong enough to anticipate and defeat naval raids at the beginning of hostilities and to protect the canal against more serious land operations liable to be undertaken later. If the enemy is operating on one ocean only, it might be possible to send reenforcements from the United States, but to count on such relief would be running too great chances. By authority of the Republic of Panama, this garrison is given facilities in time of peace to operate beyond the Canal Zone in order that the troops may be properly trained for their special mission and made familiar with the terrain over which they may be called upon to operate in defending the canal.

14. Guantanamo: The policy of the United States contemplates the establishment of a naval base at Guantanamo. Garrison of Coast Artillery and mobile troops are necessary for its defense and should be assigned to station there at the proper time.

15. Alaska: The garrison of Alaska should be large enough to support the authority of the United States and, in time of war, to maintain our sovereignty over a small selected area of the Territory. As work on the Alaskan Railroad progresses, the military needs of Alaska will increase.

16. Porto Rico is to be classified with the Philippines and Guam. Unlike Alaska and Hawaii, these island possessions have not been organized as Territories; nevertheless, they all belong to the United States and must be protected.

GENERAL REQUIREMENTS OF HOME SERVICE.

17. General distribution of Coast Artillery troops in fortified areas: It has already been shown where we should have garrisons for over-sea service, and why. It now remains to show how we should distribute our regular troops for service at home. Coast Artillery stations should correspond to the fortified areas on the seacoast, and these are indicated by the position of the harbor defenses, which are at present located as follows:

Portland, Me.; Portsmouth, N. H.; Boston; New Bedford; Narragansett Bay; Long Island Sound; New York; the Delaware; Baltimore; the Potomac; Chesapeake Bay; Cape Fear; Charleston; Savannah; Tampa; Key West; Pensacola; Mobile; New Orleans; Galveston; San Diego; Los Angeles; San Francisco; Pudget Sound; and the Columbia.

18. General distribution of mobile troops in strategic areas: As previously explained, the influence of harbor defenses is limited to the areas within the range of their guns. To provide harbor defenses without mobile forces necessary to cover the unprotected intervals that lie between them would be comparable with attempting to make a house burglar proof by barring the doors and leaving the windows open. There is not a case in history where seacoast fortifications, efficiently manned, have been captured by direct attack from the sea. In all cases of capture mobile land forces have been employed for the purpose, and an enemy that hopes for success must undertake landing operations against us. We must therefore decide upon a rational distribution of our mobile forces to meet this contingency.

19. Puget Sound area: Western Washington is bordered on the east by the steep and rugged Cascade Mountains, on the south by the Columbia River, and on the north by Juan de Fuca Strait and Canada. This corner of the United States is completely cut off from the rest of the country by great natural obstacles and presents an extensive front for attack by sea. While the maps show some 20 passes across the Cascade Mountains, communication with the East is almost entirely by three railroads, all crossing at points less than 50 miles apart, and having tunnels or other vulnerable structures. The only practicable wagon road is effectually closed to traffic for between four and five months each year by heavy snows. Communication with the south is by one line of railroad, crossing the Columbia River by bridge at Vancouver. Communication between this section and the east and south is thus largely dependent upon a number of structures readily destroyed by high explosives and impossible of restoration to traffic within a definite time. The two railroads along the Columbia River, at the point where it breaks through the mountains, could be easily wrecked so as to require considerable time to repair, and the gorge could be held by a small force against a large one coming from the east. If an enemy succeeds in entering western Washington and in seizing and destroying the important bridges and tunnels, he would be so securely established as to render it extremely difficult to dislodge him. In this rich region an invader could maintain himself indefinitely. The harbor defenses maintained in this region are reasonably strong. Ordinary precaution demands that a mobile force of reasonable strength be also maintained in this region.

20. California area: There are five transcontinental lines of railway entering California. The Western Pacific and Southern Pacific by the passes through the Sierras northeast of Sacramento; the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe and the San Pedro, Los Angeles & Salt Lake via Daggetts Pass northeast of Los Angeles; and the Southern Pacific via the Salton Sea and Gorgonia Pass, southeast of Los Angeles. There are no other passes through the Sierras that have been considered practicable. There is no railroad running south into Lower California. Only one railroad, the Southern Pacific, runs north into Oregon. As in the Puget Sound region, communication with the East is largely dependent upon structures readily destroyed by explosives and impossible of restoration to traffic within a definite time; California and the greater centers of population are separated by wide expanses of sparsely settled country. To transport promptly large bodies of troops into California would be difficult, if not impossible, in face of opposition at the passes. The invader would have a most fertile region at his back, while the reverse would be the situation with us.

The harbor defenses maintained in this region are reasonably strong, but they are of little use unless supported by a reasonably strong mobile force maintained in this region.

To rely for defense during the first stages of a war upon a mobile force shipped in from the East is to invite disaster.

21. Atlantic area: In case of war with a first-class power on the Atlantic, that portion of our country lying between and including Maine and Virginia would undoubtedly be the primary object of an invader. While all other points along the Atlantic and Gulf coasts and all points on our land frontiers would undoubtedly be in danger, the danger would be secondary to that of the North Atlantic States above named. Here, also, the harbor defenses are reasonably strong, and here, also, a mobile force should be kept sufficient in size to hold important points until the citizen soldiery can be mobilized.

While many other regions are important, the three regions described—Puget Sound, California, and the North Atlantic States—contain the critical areas.

22. Middle West area: The center of population of the United States is in the Middle West, and here should be located a mobile force for use in case of need, on either the Pacific or Atlantic coast, the northern or southern border.

NECESSARY STRENGTH OF MOBILE TROOPS FOR OVER-SEA SERVICE.

23. Constant study of the problem which confronts each of our over-sea garrisons in connection with the advance made in arms, transportation, tactics, lines of information, methods of communication, undersea craft, and aerial operations has led to the conclusions that the strength of the over-sea garrisons herein given is the minimum below which they should not be allowed to fall at any time.

The general requirements of over-sea service have already been stated for each of the several localities concerned. It now remains to determine the necessary strength to meet these requirements, taking up each case in turn.

24. The Philippines: If in accordance with national policy it is decided to keep the American flag flying in the Philippines in war as in peace, it becomes essential to hold Manila Bay.

25. Oahu: Having in mind the principles governing the relations between home and over-sea garrisons, the force maintained at all times in Oahu should include:

Nine regiments of Infantry (three brigades).
One regiment of Cavalry.
Two regiments of Field Artillery.
Two battalions Engineers; one battalion Signal Corps; one aero squadron; one telegraph company.
Two ambulance companies.
Fourteen companies Coast Artillery.
This force will total about 25,000 combatant officers and men.

26. Panama: The force maintained at all times in the Canal Zone should include:

Nine regiments of Infantry (three brigades).
One regiment of Cavalry.
One regiment of Field Artillery (3-inch mountain howitzers).
Two battalions of Engineers; one battalion Signal Corps; on aero squadron; one telegraph company.
One ambulance company; one evacuation hospital.
Twenty-one companies Coast Artillery Corps.
This force will total about 24,000 combatant officers and men.

27. Guantanamo: The policy of the United States contemplates the establishment of a naval base at Guantanamo. Garrisons of Coast Artillery and mobile troops are necessary for its defense and should be assigned to station there at the proper time.

28. Alaska: The garrison of Alaska should be large enough to support the authority of the United States and, in time of war, to maintain our sovereignty over a small selected area of the Territory. As work on the Alaskan Railroad progresses the military needs of Alaska will increase.

In time of peace it is believed that the Alaskan garrison should be one regiment of infantry (1,915 officers and men), to be increased later as circumstances may demand.

29. Porto Rico: The present garrison, reorganized into a full regiment of three battalions, etc., is sufficient (1,915 officers and men).

30. The following table gives a summary of the minimum garrison to be maintained on over-sea service:

Table of garrisons for over-sea stations.

NECESSARY STRENGTH OF MOBILE TROOPS FOR HOME SERVICE.

31. Careful studies made at the War College, extending over a period of years, lead to the conclusion that the strength of the Infantry, Cavalry, Field Artillery, Engineers, and Signal troops of the Regular Army maintained at home in time of peace, and the distribution of administrative units of these arms in the principal strategic areas, should be as given in the following table:

Combatant troops.

	Infantry regiment.	Cavalry regiment.	Field Artillery regiment.	Engineer battalions.	Battalions, Signal Corps.	Aero squadrons.
Puget Sound area	9	3	[1]3½	2½	[1]1½	1

Middle West	9	3	3½	2½	1½	1
Mexican border	.....	6	1	⅝	1	1
Total	36	20	15	10	7	5

[1] Each Cavalry brigade to have 1 battalion horse artillery; 1 company mounted Engineers; 1 company Signal Corps.

Approximate total, 121,000 officers and men.

These troops should be organized in higher tactical units and distributed in strategic areas substantially as follows:

Puget Sound area: One division (less divisional Cavalry) and one Cavalry Brigade (of three regiments).

California: One division and one Cavalry brigade.

North Atlantic States: One division and one Cavalry brigade.

Middle West: One division (less divisional Cavalry) and one Cavalry brigade.

Mexican border: West of El Paso, one Cavalry brigade; east of El Paso, one Cavalry brigade.

NECESSARY STRENGTH OF COAST ARTILLERY TROOPS REQUIRED FOR SERVICE OVERSEAS AND AT HOME.

32. The strength of the Coast Artillery depends upon the number of guns and mine fields installed and projected, and upon the assistance to be received from Organized Militia units. An estimate prepared in the office of the Chief of Coast Artillery gives the following strength in companies required under the supposition that all mine fields and all over-sea guns and one-half the guns at home are manned from the Regular Army Companies.

Philippines	26
Oahu	14
Panama	21
United States	228

Total companies (gun and mine)	289
Officers and men	34,413

TOTAL STRENGTH OF THE REGULAR TROOPS REQUIRED FOR ALL SERVICES.

33. Combining all previous estimates of Coast Artillery and mobile troops required for service in over-sea garrisons and at home, the following tabular statement of the required strength of the Regular Army in units appropriate to each arm, results, viz:

Localities.	Infantry regiments.	Cavalry regiments.	Field Artillery regiments.	Coast Artillery companies.	Engineer battalions.	Signal Corps battalions.
Philippines[2]	9	3	3	26	1½	1

Total required	65	25	21	289	15⅛	[3]10

[1] Includes aero squadrons.
[2] Nine regiments Infantry, 2 regiments Field Artillery, 2 battalions Engineers. Filipinos to be added, 21,000 officers and men.
[3] This estimate can only be verified by an inspection of all the harbors in question, for which inspection there has not been sufficient time since this estimate was received.

These figures may be summarized as follows:

Oversea:
Mobile (combatant)	74,500
Coast Artillery Corps	7,500
		82,000
In United States:
Mobile (combatant)	121,000
Coast Artillery Corps	27,000
		148,000
Total:
Mobile (combatant)	195,500
		230,000

To this total should be added officers and men for the Sanitary, Quartermaster, Ordnance Department, etc., appropriate to a force of this strength, amounting approximately to 30,000 officers and men. Including Philippine Scouts, 21,000, the grand total becomes 281,000.

34. Organization: The tables of organization, approved and published on February 25, 1914, for the information and government of the Regular Army and Organized Militia of the United States, have been taken as the guide in estimating the numerical strength of the personnel of the various tactical and administrative units mentioned in this report. This was done as a matter of convenience and because the service generally is familiar with these tables, which are the latest official publication of the War Department on this subject. They conform to the Field Service Regulations, and are the best that can be devised under the limitation of the present laws governing the Army, but it can not be too emphatically stated that they are for emergency use only and contain certain undesirable and unscientific features, which should be corrected as soon as the necessary legislation can be obtained. For example, the war organization shown in the tables is provisional only, while the peace strength is arranged so as not to exceed the total enlisted strength of about 93,000 men now permitted by existing appropriations.

This limitation falls heaviest upon the Infantry, whose organizations on home service are maintained at only 43 per cent of full statutory strength, while the Cavalry organizations are maintained at 75 per cent and those of Field Artillery at 77 per cent of such strength. It is generally conceded that our Infantry companies should each have the full statutory strength of 150 men in order to permit proper training of the officers in time of peace and supply efficient fighting strength in time of war.

In consequence of the greatly reduced strength of these Infantry organizations, their efficiency is unduly decreased and overhead charges correspondingly increase.

The requirements of modern war demand that a machine-gun unit, a supply unit, and certain mounted men be attached to each regiment, and that units of various strengths be assigned to brigade and division headquarters. None of these units is authorized by law, yet all are essential. Tables of organization, 1914, represent an effort to adapt an archaic statutory organization to modern requirements by organizing the necessary additional units, provisionally. This has been done by detaching from statutory organizations the personnel required. An examination of the tables will show that more than 5 per cent of the Infantry personnel authorized by Congress have been diverted from their legitimate duty as members of statutory organizations and have been assigned to provisional units which, while necessary and essential, have only the sanction of departmental authority and lack the efficiency which can only be given by statute. In the Cavalry more than 9 per cent are similarly diverted.

Recognizing these facts, the War College Division of the General Staff has prepared a plan for organizing on modern lines an army of the strength just shown to be necessary for the national needs. Should this plan be approved, the organization of the Regular Army, the militia, and whatever reserves are formed would proceed along the new lines.

II. The Organized Militia.

35. The act of Congress approved April 25, 1914, commonly known as the volunteer law, defines the land forces of the United States as "the Regular Army, the organized land militia while in the service of the United States, and such volunteer forces as Congress may authorize."

The Organized Militia, in addition to its use as a State force, is available for use by the Federal Government, as provided in the Constitution, viz, to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, and repel invasion.

36. Constitutional functions of the Organized Militia: Its constitutional functions are the following:

(a) A State force to preserve order within the State limits, in order to avoid calling upon the Regular Army or the Organized Militia of other States to discharge such function.

(b) A Federal force when called forth by the President, as prescribed by Congress, for any of the three purposes authorized by the Constitution.

37. Some uses of the Organized Militia as a Federal force: Having been called forth as militia, they may be used as follows:

(a) As Coast Artillery supports and reserves.

(b) To guard and protect certain bridges, canal locks, arsenals, depots of supplies, docks, navy yards, and other vunerable points in the home territory.

(c) To guard lines of communication within the limits of the United States.

38. Limitations: It is stated later in this report that 12 months, at 150 hours per month, "is considered the minimum length of time of actual training considered necessary to prepare troops for war service." Due to constitutional limitations, Congress has not the power to fix and require such an amount of training for the Organized Militia. No force can be considered a portion of our first line whose control and training is so little subject to Federal authority in peace. No force should be considered a portion of our first line in war unless it be maintained fully organized and equipped in peace at practically war strength. This would exclude the Organized Militia from consideration for service in the first line mainly because of the impossibility of giving it in peace the training required for such function. It may be necessary to continue Federal support of the Organized Militia in order that some organized force may be immediately available for the purposes set forth in paragraphs 3 and 4.

39. Recommendations: In the preparation of plans for the national defense and for the preservation of the honor and dignity of the United States, the number of troops that are deemed necessary are largely in excess of the total regular and militia forces available in the United States.

It is only during the existence of war, or when war is imminent, that any other forces may be raised under existing law. When Congress so authorizes the President, he may call forth volunteers.

Section 3 of the volunteer law provides that under certain conditions organizations of the Organized Militia may be received into the Volunteer Service in advance of any other organizations of the same arm or class from the same State, Territory, or District; and section 4 of the act of May 27, 1908, amending the militia law, provides that the militia shall be called into the service in advance of any volunteer force that may be raised.

It is evident that it can not be known prior to the existence of the imminence of war what organizations, if any, of the Organized Militia will enter the Volunteer Service, and that no definite plans can be prepared providing for the use of such organizations, either as militia or as volunteers, until war is actually upon us.

No legislation affecting the Organized Militia is recommended beyond the repeal of all provisions of laws now in effect whereby militia or militia organizations may or must be received into the Federal service in advance of any other forces.

This recommendation is not to be construed as advocating express repeal of certain sections of existing laws relating to the Organized Militia, but as suggesting that any legislation hereafter proposed for the organization of a Federal reserve force shall contain the usual concluding section repealing all laws and parts of laws inconsistent therewith, and that such legislation be so framed as to render inconsistent with it the provisions of law just referred to.

III. Reserves.

40. Reserves include: (a) Well-instructed soldiers of the Regular Army furloughed to what is herein termed the regular reserve, (b) citizen soldiers, (c) reserve officers.

41. The regular reserve: As the United States should have a mobile force of 500,000 soldiers available at home at the outbreak of war, the Army, with the regular reserve, should amount to this strength. In order to develop the necessary regular reserve with the Army at the strength advocated in this policy, enlistments would have to be for about eight years—two with the colors and six in reserve. That would, in eight years, result in approximately the following mobile forces at home available at the outbreak of war:

(1) Mobile regular troops (combatant) with the colors	121,000
(2) The regular reserve	379,000

During the first weeks of war in this country the military situation will probably be critical. At that time every fully trained soldier should be put in the field. To do that with the small military establishment herein advocated it is necessary that during peace the Army be kept at war strength, and that the regular reserve be organized and not kept back to replace losses expected during war. Such losses should be replaced from depot units.

42. Citizen soldiers: In addition to the 500,000 fully trained mobile troops mentioned above, at least 500,000 more—a total of 1,000,000 men—should be prepared to take the field immediately on the outbreak of war and should have had sufficient previous military training to enable them to meet a trained enemy within three months. Twelve months' intensive training is the minimum that will prepare troops for war service. Therefore the 500,000 partly trained troops above referred to require nine months' military training before war begins. Military efficiency of reserves requires that Regular Army officers be assigned thereto for training purposes—at least one to every 400 men—and that organizations and specially designated noncommissioned officers of the Army be utilized in instructing reserves, as far as practicable.

Based upon experience with Tables of Organization, 1914, the War College Division has recently prepared a new plan of organization for the Army. The Regular Army and the reserves should be organized according to this plan. Organizations should be formed of men from the districts to which their respective organizations are assigned for recruiting. For this purpose, each organization should be assigned to a district from which recruits most suitable for the service required of the organization may be obtained—mounted units to horse-raising districts, technical troops to manufacturing districts, etc. As a rule, the size of districts should be about in proportion to population of the qualifications—age, etc.—required. Organizations in war should be kept at full strength from the depot units which they should have in their respective recruiting districts.

43. Reserve officers: Officers for staff and organizations of reserves, and officers for temporary appointment in the Regular Army, as provided for in section 8 of the volunteer law (act of Congress approved Apr. 25, 1914), should be selected and trained in time of peace. The President should be authorized to issue, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, commissions as reserve officers to citizens of the United States who upon examination prescribed by the Secretary of War, demonstrate their physical, mental, moral, and professional fitness therefor, and who duly obligate themselves to render military service to the United States while their commissions are valid. Such commissions should be valid five years, and renewable under such regulations regarding examinations and qualifications as the Secretary of War may from time to time prescribe.

IV. Volunteers.

44. In addition to any forces that may be maintained and trained in time of peace, provision must be made for vastly increasing such forces in time of war. These must come from the untrained body of citizens, and provision for raising them is contained in the act of Congress approved April 25, 1914.

45. This act meets the military needs for raising volunteer troops, as far as concerns the enlisted personnel, except in two particulars, which are: First, that under the existing laws certain organizations of the militia, with numbers far below the full strength, can enter the volunteer force in advance of other similar volunteer organizations from the same State; and, second, no volunteers of any arm or branch can be raised until all the militia of that particular arm or branch have been called into the service of the United States. The changes necessary to remedy these defects have been set forth in paragraph 39 under the subject of the Organized Militia.

V. Reserve Material.

46. Of all the features disclosed by the war in Europe none stands more clearly revealed than the power to be derived from national economic organization behind the armed forces of a nation.

47. In a war of gigantic proportions the chances of success are immeasurably lessened by wastage, abuse, and confusion. Steps should be taken looking toward a national organization of our economic and industrial resources as well as our resources in fighting men.

48. In its report the commission appointed by the President to investigate the conduct of the War Department in the War with Spain used the following language:

"One of the lessons taught by the war is that the country should hereafter be in a better state of preparation for war. Testimony has been taken on this subject and suggestions have been made that large supplies of all the material not liable to deterioration should be kept on hand, to be continuously issued and renewed, so that in any emergency they might be available. Especially should this be the case with such supplies, equipment, and ordnance stores as are not in general use in the United States and which can not be rapidly obtained in open market."

49. The lack of such articles as shoes, wagons, harness, rifles, saddles, medical chests, and so on, will render ineffective an army just as certainly as will the lack of ammunition.

50. For the purposes of storage military supplies may be divided into four classes:

(a) Supplies that can be obtained in great quantities in the open market at any time.

(b) Those that can be obtained in sufficient quantities on 15 days' notice.

(c) Those that can be obtained on three months' notice.

(d) Those that can not be obtained within three months.

51. The War College division of the General Staff is of the opinion that for purposes of defense we should maintain the troops enumerated in Parts I and II of this report.

52. A fully trained force, to be effective during the critical period when war is imminent and during the first few weeks of a war, must not be hampered by lack of necessary supplies and equipment. For this reason, supplies of all kinds which can not be obtained in the open market at any time must be kept on hand, in use and in store, at home and oversea, sufficient to equip without delay all troops whose training warrants sending them promptly into the field.

53. It is probable that as soon as war becomes imminent the continental army—500,000 mobile troops—will also be called out. As this partially trained force can not be expected to take the field within three months' time, it is practicable to refrain, after the third year, from keeping on hand or in store for it any articles of equipment except those necessary to complete its training and those which can not be procured within three months.

54. The total number of harbor-defense troops necessary is about 50,000. Due to conditions of service, it is believed that ultimately supplies of all kinds for 60,000 should be kept on hand.

55. In any great war volunteers must be called out in addition to the troops above enumerated.

56. It would be unwise to have on hand at the beginning of a war merely the supplies sufficient to place in the field our first contingent of troops and to complete the training of the continental army, and to be unprepared to supply to even a limited extent the volunteer army we should have to raise, not to mention replacements of arms, ammunition, clothing, and equipment of all kinds for those already in the field; but on account of the great sum of money which will be necessary in entering upon a program for collecting and storing military supplies it is believed that the subject of equipment for a volunteer army and replacements for the Regular and continental armies should be provided for by obtaining options with domestic manufacturers to furnish the required supplies, all of domestic manufacture, in accordance with tentative contracts to be made by the supply departments with such manufacturers in time of peace. By so doing we will be taking the initial steps toward organizing the industrial and economic resources of the country as well as its resources in fighting men.

57. Referring to Part II, approximately the following troops will be available at the close of the successive years:

	Fully trained mobile troops.	Partially trained continental army.	Harbor-defense troops.	Total.
First year	160,000	185,000	30,000	375,000
Second year	219,000	351,000	40,000	610,000
Third year	320,000	500,000	50,000	870,000
Fourth year	383,000	500,000	52,000	935,000
Fifth year	439,000	500,000	54,000	993,000
Sixth year	489,000	500,000	56,000	1,045,000
Seventh year	534,000	500,000	58,000	1,092,000
Eighth year	574,000	500,000	60,000	1,134,000

A study of these figures and of the difficulties we have experienced in the past in the matter of supplies lead to the conclusion that the program adopted for procuring reserve supplies should be such that at the close of each year we should have in use and in store, at home and oversea, supplies of all kinds necessary to equip:

	Infantry divisions.	Cavalry divisions of 9 regiments.	Harbor-defense troops.
First year	13	3	30,000
Second year	22	5	40,000
Third year	32	6	50,000
Fourth year	34	7	52,000
Fifth year	36	8	54,000
Sixth year	37	9	56,000
Seventh year	38	10	58,000
Eighth year	40	10	60,000

The supplies acquired during the first three years should include all articles which can not be obtained in sufficient quantities on 15 days' notice, those acquired during the last five years to include only those articles which can not be obtained on three months' notice. After the eighth year the program should be extended to provide for the storing of such additional machine guns, rifles, field guns, ammunition, etc., as may be considered advisable.

58. In order that vast supplies pertaining to one supply bureau should not be secured and relatively nothing be done by other supply bureaus, supplies should be obtained progressively in complete division units.

59. In order that the efforts of the various supply bureaus may be properly coordinated by the Chief of Staff, reserve supplies should be collected in general supply depots located in accordance with the general principle below enumerated. Each general supply depot should be considered a place of issue in time of peace for all articles of field equipment, so that the stock on hand will be continually turned over and the machinery for the issuing and forwarding of supplies will be in operation at the outbreak of war. The commander of each general supply depot should be either a line or a staff officer specially selected by and reporting direct to the Chief of Staff and independent of the control of any one particular staff department but keeping in touch with all. The commander of each general supply depot should be assisted by the necessary commissioned, enlisted, and civilian personnel. Supplies for not more than three division units should be stored at any one locality. Each place selected for a reserve storehouse should be one that will be at all times under adequate military protection, where ground is available and where abundant railroad facilities exist.

60. As a general military principle, no supply depot, arsenal, nor manufacturing plant of any considerable size, supported by War Department appropriations for military purposes, should be established or maintained east of the Appalachian Mountains, west of the Cascade or Sierra Nevada Mountains, nor within 200 miles of our Canadian or Mexican borders, and steps should be taken gradually to cause to be moved depots and manufacturing plants already established in violation of this military principle.

61. The estimated cost of the field equipment of one Infantry division, Tables of Organization 1914, is as follows:

	Can be obtained in the open market in great quantities at any time.	Can be obtained on 15 days' notice.	Can be obtained on 3 months' notice.	Can not be obtained on 3 months' notice.
Signal supplies	$722.12	$1,688.51	$6,030.46	$385,310.26
Quartermaster supplies	51,983.35	54,054.45	3,177,083.47
Engineer supplies
Ordnance supplies	5,779.67	7,730.96	257,489.89	4,164,770.68
Medical supplies	10,997.95	10,189.63	88,861.51

And the estimated cost of one Cavalry division of nine regiments is approximately as follows:

	Can be obtained in the open market in great quantities at any time.	Can be obtained on 15 days' notice.	Can be obtained on 3 months' notice.	Can not be obtained on 3 months' notice.
Signal supplies	$370.80	$1,638.53	$4,290.61	$277,156.43
Quartermaster supplies	55,102.48	76,143.40	4,584,628.93
Engineer supplies
Medical supplies	13,454.99	13,960.57	108,630.36

62. While the amount of money involved is large, practically all of it will remain at home, especially if every effort be made by the supply bureaus to eliminate from supply tables all articles not of domestic manufacture. It must also be kept in mind that it is cheaper to buy war supplies in time of peace than in time of war.

[Memorandum for the Chief of Staff.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF,
Washington, September 11, 1915.

Subject: Estimate of cost of the military establishment recommended by the War College Division, September 11, 1915.

1. The following estimate of cost is submitted pursuant to instructions of the Chief of Staff dated September 7, 1915:

2. The figures for the cost of the Regular Army are based upon the actual appropriations therefor during five consecutive years. (See W. C. D. 9053–81.) Where appropriations made during those five years have been in part employed in building up a reserve of supplies, the figures have been placed, in the following estimates, under the heading "Reserve matériel." The initial cost will, of course, be greater than that of any succeeding year, for in the first year have been included a complete equipment of new machine guns, field guns, etc. After the first year the expense will be for upkeep only. As for shelter, the figures submitted are based upon the expense of upkeep of all present occupied barracks and quarters plus the expense of putting in cantonment all new regular units to be organized.

3. The estimated cost should not convey the idea of actual expenditure, for it must be kept in mind that military supplies, whose value is approximately $43,000,000, are at present in store and available for use.

4. The estimated cost for the Organized Militia is the same as that indicated in W. C. D. 9053–75, August 21, 1915.

5. The estimated cost of the continental army has been obtained by adding 25 per cent to the estimated cost of 400,000 men, submitted in W. C. D. 9053–75, August 21, 1915.

6. The estimated costs of reserve matériel given in paragraph 61, Statement of a Proper Military Policy, have been submitted by the chiefs of the bureaus of the War Department concerned.

7. Estimated cost:

Regular Army:
First year	$258,960,000
Per year thereafter	249,973,000
Organized Militia, per year	7,060,000
Continental army:
First year	87,500,000
Second year	70,000,000
Third year	85,000,000
Per year thereafter	62,500,000

M. M. MACOMB,
Brigadier General, Chief of War College Division.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, there has been a great deal of discussion about serious differences between the Secretary of War and the Committees on Military Affairs of the House and Senate. There were, of course, some differences, but I think none of them are so serious but that they may be adjusted in conference.

I want to say, in reference to the Senate bill, Mr. President, that I have been working at it for several months, with consultations now and then with different officers of the Army in whose judgment I had confidence. When the bill was finally framed by me as a basis for the preparation of a proper bill, it was not introduced into the Senate, but it was printed and submitted to the Committee on Military Affairs for discussion; so that the bill, as it comes out of the committee now, has been prepared by the Military Committee, and there has been at no time, I desire to say to the Senate, any political question, any policy of party, or any other subject discussed except this bill. My Republican friends have never at any time undertaken to inject any political or partisan discussions into the deliberations of the committee or to interfere with the preparation of a bill that would have for its purpose the very best interests of the whole country. So it has been with my Democratic friends on the committee in the preparation of the bill before the committee.

After it was prepared, the committee sent the bill to the War Department for submission to the War College and the General Staff, and we have had the reports of those organizations on the bill, with estimates and everything I think the Senate will want to be advised about. We have had hearings that went into the whole question without stint, as far as it was possible for us to go. In the consideration of the bill, in order that the Senate may know that this committee was trying to do its whole duty to the Senate and to the country, I will state that we had before us the so-called Garrison plan; we had the Hay bill; we had before us every measure which had been prepared or had emanated from any authoritative source; and this bill of ours has embodied in it what we concluded was the best of all of them, and I believe I am safe in saying that it has the pretty general approval of the experts in the Army and in the country. While we do not give the Army what it asks, we have undertaken to reorganize it so as to have it along the lines of a consistent organization.

In our further efforts to get the bill before the Senate in proper shape we had the Secretary of War detail to us two very competent and distinguished officers of the Army, to whom we are greatly indebted for the assistance they have given us. Gen. William H. Carter, a retired Army officer, who has probably commanded larger bodies of troops in this country than any other officer in the Army, has assisted us, and Maj. William D. Connor, an officer of the Engineer Corps, was with us, and has remained with us all the time, not to formulate a bill but in an advisory capacity, to discuss with the committee all the technical questions which have arisen, and they have been faithful in their efforts to assist in reaching a proper conclusion. So much for the genesis of the bill and the efforts the committee has made to try to get before the Senate a proper measure.

The bill deals with five subjects, and it is in that connection that I desire to have the Senate bear in mind the report from which I read a while ago. They are, first, the regular force—that is, the Regular Army; second, officers of the reserve corps; third, reserve officers' training corps; fourth, the volunteer force; and, fifth, the National Guard. That covers all of the possible sources from which to organize an army, whether it be a regular army or a volunteer force or the National Guard.

Now, for the increases. I want to show the Senate the increases which the present bill makes over the existing Regular Army organization. It increases the Regular Army by the addition of 34⅓ regiments of Infantry, 10 regiments of Cavalry, 15 regiments of Field Artillery, 5 regiments of Engineers, 93 companies of Coast Artillery, 2 battalions of Mounted Engineers, and 7 aero squadrons. The total increase of the enlisted personnel of the Army over and above the present organization is 74,789 men. That is exclusive of the Hospital Corps and the Quartermaster Corps, because under the law as it is now these two branches of the service are not considered or counted as a part of the enlisted strength. They have never been counted as such; in other words, they are not a combatant force and their duties are not in the line of the Army.

Mr. STONE. But they are a very important branch of the service.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They are a very important branch, and the Army could not get along without them, I will say to the Senator. The authorized strength in enlisted men, including the Philippine Scouts, at the present time is 89,324; the Quartermaster Crops, 6,000; the Hospital Corps, 4,012; and unassigned recruits, 4,000; making a total present actual strength of the line, including the Philippine Scouts, the Quartermaster Corps, and the Hospital Corps, 102,660 men. That is what the Army consists of to-day.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is that the authorized, or is that the actual strength?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is the actual strength. Of course there are included in those 102,660 men, as I have just stated, and not to be considered as a part of the enlisted strength, 4,900 in the Quartermaster Corps, 4,436 in the Hospital Corps, and 4,000 unassigned recruits. The unassigned recruits are those that have been enlisted in the service but have not yet reached their destination. The Philippine Scouts are also included in the total I have given.

Mr. President, the present bill, if enacted into law, will give——

Mr. SIMMONS. How many Philippine Scouts are there?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will give the Senator the exact number—5,733.

Mr. STONE. That is a sort of local force.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The scouts are used over in the Philippines, but they are a part of the Army.

Mr. TILLMAN. May they be brought over here?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I presume so; but they are made part of the Army for the purpose of service in the Philippines.

Mr. President, the pending bill would give us, if enacted into law, an enlisted strength, including the Philippine Scouts, of 174,789 men. If we add to that the Quartermaster Corps, the Hospital Corps, and the unassigned recruits, it would give us 194,586 men.

Now, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to this difference between the House and Senate bills: The House bill appears to give only a strength of 140,000 men; but there are to be added to that the men I have added to make the strength under the Senate bill 194,586—the Hospital Corps and the Quartermaster Corps, whatever that number might be—so that the enlisted strength provided in the House bill would be run up in excess of 140,000 if these branches of the service be counted as part of the strength of the Army.

In order to have the matter in form for the purpose of comparison under the present bill, the actual increase in the present force would be as follows: Enlisted men, including the Philippine Scouts, 74,789; Quartermaster Corps, 409; Hospital Corps, 3,278; unassigned recruits, 2,098; making a total increase of 80,574.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, in making these calculations does the Senator include the 20,000 that were added to the force lately?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No; I have not, because that is a matter of such recent occurrence that we have not gotten reports as to the number of men enlisted.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That 20,000 is part of this 80,000, is it not?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No, sir; I am not figuring on that in any estimates I shall give.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator means this 80,000 would be in addition to that 20,000?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Of course, if this Army bill passes, that would be absorbed in the general organization.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That was what I asked. That 20,000 is a part of this 80,000?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It would be.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is only 60,000 in addition to that 20,000?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They would be absorbed under this bill and become a part of the organization as established.

The commissioned strength of the Army as at present constituted is 5,045. The proposed increase is 5,681, practically double and a little more than double the present commissioned strength, making a total of 10,726; and therein, as I shall attempt to show a little while later, is one of the defects in the present system—the lack of officers for the proper training of the men.

The proposed organizations, if the bill is enacted, will consist of seven Infantry divisions, two Cavalry divisions, one Porto Rico regiment, the Philippine Scouts, one regiment in Alaska, and various smaller detachments of troops.

Now, I am going to call attention to a few of the defects in the present system.

One of the Senators asked me to have the present law, the Senate bill, and the House bill printed in parallel columns. The two latter might be printed in parallel columns for the purpose of comparison, Mr. President; but the military organization of this country is the result of legislation covering a period of more than 130 years. It has been embodied in independent statutes occasionally, but most generally added in the form of riders to appropriation bills; so that it would be almost impossible to parallel the Military Code, which consists of about 680 pages, with these two bills so as to make it intelligible to anybody. We have not attempted to do it, and I do not know that it would be possible to do it.

Mr. STONE. But the Senate and House bills could be paralleled?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. We could parallel these two bills; yes. The first defect in the Army, Mr. President, is recognized, and yet there is a very great difference of opinion as to what ought to be done in the premises. I refer to the number of enlisted men or the size of the Army. The resolution which was passed here some days ago providing for raising 20,000 volunteers is one indication of the lack of enlisted men to perform the service necessary to be performed in this country even at the present time. Not only is the Army too small, but the distribution of the men amongst the various arms of the service does not follow any well-defined military plan. The Infantry or Cavalry division is the militant unit for field service, and an army that is not composed of complete divisions is not a force prepared to fight for the best advantage of the numbers composing it. The number of organizations in the bill before the Senate now has been determined upon so as to provide sufficient garrisons in our oversea territories and to form from the remainder complete divisions within the United States. This existing defect is best illustrated by our so-called Cavalry division, in which there exists a full number of Cavalry regiments and one regiment of Horse Artillery, but for which none of the auxiliary troops are at present provided, such as mounted engineers, mounted signal troops, and the necessary sanitary troops and aerial squardons.

One thing in this connection that is frequently overlooked is the fact that it is absolutely essential that our foreign garrisons be kept and maintained at the war strength; because if anything should happen to our Navy—which I hope may never be—not one of them is so situated that troops could be transferred to it. So it ought to be the policy of the country, if it intends to hold these colonial possessions, to have the garrisons maintained all the time at war strength; and that has been impossible of accomplishment under the present system.

Another defect in the organization is that certain of the organizations are maintained at war strength when others are maintained at a strength entirely too small to provide for the necessary instruction of officers or of men. Take an instance in the present organization of the maximum strength of an Infantry company being 150 men and the minimum strength being 65 men: Taking away from the 65 men the number necessary for duties that they are now compelled to do—the machine-gun work, the quartermaster's and supply work, and other local details, and absences from sickness and other unavoidable causes—reduces the company in many cases to from 40 to 50 men, and sometimes even lower. Whether it be true or not I do not know, but I have heard it stated by men who claim to know that at Vera Cruz some of the companies were so depleted that the commanding officers there did not take them out on dress parade, in order not to let the people see how few men there were in the companies. So that with a minimum strength of 65 men the companies are so depleted under the present system that there are not enough men even to train the officers in their work or to have the men properly trained.

Under the present bill we keep the maximum strength of the company at 150 men, as the present organization is, but we place the minimum strength at 100 men, so that, counting the ordinary absences from sickness and other unavoidable causes, it might reduce the men to 90; but we have made provision for the constitution of headquarters companies and supply companies and machine-gun companies independent of the regular organization, so that men are not detailed from the companies, as now, to perform this work, but they are separate organizations. No modern army is attempted to be equipped in any other way than that the regiments shall have their supply companies to do the work which the Commissary Department now does and to do the work of the machine-gun and headquarters companies which enlisted men now perform, reducing and depleting the active fighting force of the Army. That is one of the essential and material changes made by the Senate bill over the present organization, in thus constituting a regimental headquarters, a machine-gun company, and a supply company, so that in future, if this bill is enacted, these men will not have to be detailed from the other active services of the Army to do work which requires trained men.

Another defect in the system, it has seemed to the committee, is the term of enlistment.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, would it trouble the Senator if I asked him a question?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Not at all.

Mr. LODGE. What does that make the regimental strength? I mean, including these additional companies, the machine-gun companies and the headquarters companies, which are now filled from the line.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will give it to the Senator. It would give a total minimum strength of 1,336 and a maximum strength of 1,964, with all these included.

The terms of enlistment were thought by the committee to have been too strict. The House recognized that proposition, too, because a change was made in the bill covering enlistment. It has been suggested—though I have my doubts about its correctness—that desertions have been caused largely by reason of the fact that long-term enlistments induced men to desert to get back into civil occupations. But, Mr. President, there is absolutely no accounting for desertions. Under all conditions, under all circumstances, no matter what they have been, there have been desertions, varying in large numbers or in small numbers in such a way as to make impossible of ascertainment the reasons therefor, and the War Department has been unable to reach a satisfactory conclusion on it. But however that may be, under existing law the enlistment term binds the man to serve for four years with the colors, with the proviso that he may be passed to the reserve at the end of three years. Now, note the modification of the law: Under the proposed law the terms of enlistment have been ameliorated so that an enlisted man, if serving within the limits of the United States, can, if he so desires, go to the reserve at any time after the expiration of two years. That is at his discretion. If particularly apt and intelligent, he may be furloughed to the reserve after the expiration of one year. So that no man hereafter can claim that he has been compelled to desert because of the long term of enlistment, either with the colors or in the reserve, because if he is active and if he is diligent and if he is bright and desires to prove the mettle that is in him he can get out of his own volition at the end of one year.

Mr. GORE. The full term is left four years, however?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I should like to understand the Senator as he goes along, if I can, and if it will not disturb him I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It will not disturb me at all.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator says that as a result of one of the defects in the present system, which authorizes a company to be 150 men, some of the companies at Vera Cruz only had 65 men. What was the defect in the system that resulted in the companies being so depleted?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The principal defect was in detailing men from the company—that is, holding it at a minimum of 65 men and then detailing men from it to handle machine guns, and so forth, and perform other detail duties that are proposed to be performed under a separate organization.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understand how any company could be depleted if these men were taken away from the company and were assigned to other duties that are not strictly military; but what was there about the system that prevented the company being kept full if the people in charge of the Army wanted to keep it full?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The President was only authorized to have 100,000 men, and if you filled all of these companies up to a strength where the detail of men to other duties would not seriously injure the companies you would have an Army very much in excess of the authorized strength.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The defect, then, was simply that there were too many companies for the total number of troops authorized?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It might be put in that way.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. NORRIS. At the end of two years, the Senator says, under the plan the committee proposes, the private soldier, the enlisted man, passes into the reserve.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If he desires.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish the Senator would explain, unless he is expecting to do so at some other time—it seemed to me it would be appropriate to do it here, however—just what is the relation of the soldier when he becomes a member of the reserve.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The bill specifies that particularly. I will just read that part of the bill to the Senator, so that he will see. The bill itself provides exactly what his status will be when he goes out:

> On and after the 1st day of July, 1916, all enlistments in the Regular Army shall be for a term of seven years, the first four years to be in the active service with a branch of which those enlisted form a part and, except as otherwise provided herein, the last three years in the Regular Army reserve hereinafter provided for.

They go into the reserve anyhow after the term of enlistment expires, whether they serve three years, or whether they serve two years, or whether they serve one year, and the reserve system is provided for in this bill.

Mr. NORRIS. What is the status of the soldier when he goes to the reserve? Does he still draw pay? Is he subject to call at any time?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is another provision of the bill to which I wish to call attention. A good deal of fun has been made of the fact that only 16 men were a short while ago within the reserve that was attempted to be created under a former act of Congress. That was true then, but the fact was lost sight of that the bill creating this reserve, under the law as it then stood, had not taken effect. It took effect, I think, some time in November. I am not sure about the date, but there are a good many more now. But the difficulty in the matter of the creation of a reserve is the difficulty in keeping up with the men after they go into the reserve.

A man goes out of the Army at San Francisco, for instance. He works his way on the farms and in the factories and in other ways to New York. He finally becomes a resident of the State of New Jersey. It has been impossible to keep up with him. Now, in order to undertake to make the reservist feel that he is really a part of the Government and to keep in touch with him we have provided here—that is one of the new features of the bill—that hereafter the reservist shall receive $24 per annum as a reservist, payable semiannually.

Mr. NORRIS. The reservist is subject to call at any time, is he?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Until his term of enlistment expires.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; until his term of enlistment expires.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not at any time.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Only in time of war, of course.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Or threatened war.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, let me ask the Senator another question. When the active list is depleted by soldiers going into the reserve, is that list then repleted by additional enlistments?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Oh, yes; recruiting is going on all the time.

Mr. NORRIS. The figures which the Senator has given with regard to the strength of the Army do not include the reserve?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Oh, no, sir. There is very serious difference of opinion as to our ability to recruit the Army even up to the maximum of 250,000 provided by this bill or to a minimum of 178,000. I believe The Adjutant General claims that it is not possible to keep a total strength of more than 150,000 troops as a minimum.

Mr. BRANDEGEE subsequently said: Will the Senator from Oregon permit me, before the Secretary proceeds to read the bill, to have inserted in the RECORD the act referred to in section 56, which is the section of the bill authorizing the President to organize and maintain a volunteer force?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think it would be well to have it inserted.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think it would be well to have it in the RECORD so that we can see it. Therefore I ask that it be inserted in that portion of the Senator's remarks where he was discussing the provisions of section 56 of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The act referred to is as follows:

[Public, No. 90, 63d Cong.—(H. R. 7138).]

An act to provide for raising the volunteer forces of the United States in time of actual or threatened war.

Be it enacted, etc., That the land forces of the United States shall consist of the Regular Army, the organized land militia while in the service of the United States, and such volunteer forces as Congress may authorize.

SEC. 2. That the volunteer forces shall be raised, organized, and maintained, as in this act provided, only during the existence of war, or while war is imminent, and only after Congress shall have authorized the President to raise such a force: Provided, That the term of enlistment in the volunteer forces shall be the same as that for the Regular Army, exclusive of reserve periods, and all officers and enlisted men composing such volunteer forces shall be mustered out of the service of the United States as soon as practicable after the President shall have issued a proclamation announcing the termination of the war or the passing of the imminence thereof.

SEC. 3. That when volunteer forces are to be raised the President shall issue his proclamation, stating the number of men desired for each arm, corps, and department, within such limits as may be fixed by law, and he shall prescribe such rules and regulations, not inconsistent with the terms of this act, as may be necessary for the purpose of examining, organizing, and receiving into the service the men called for: Provided, That the power to organize volunteer forces shall include the power to provide, within such limits as are or may be prescribed by law, the officers and enlisted men of all grades and classes, and the trained nurses, male and female, that may be necessary in the various arms, corps, and departments: Provided further, That when three-fourths of the prescribed minimum enlisted strength of any company, troop, or battery, or when three-fourths of the prescribed minimum enlisted strength of each company, troop, or battery comprised in any battalion or regiment of the organized land militia of any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, organized as prescribed by law and War Department regulations, shall volunteer and be accepted for service in the Volunteer Army as such company, troop, battery, battalion, or regiment, such organization may be received into the volunteer forces in advance of other organizations of the same arm or class from the same State, Territory, or District, and the officers in the organized land militia service with such organization may then, within the limits prescribed by law, be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, as officers of corresponding grades in the Volunteer Army and be assigned to the same grades in the said organization or elsewhere as the President may direct: Provided further, That all enlisted men received into the service in the volunteer forces shall, as far as practicable, be taken from the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia in proportion to the respective populations thereof: Provided further, That when the raising of a volunteer force shall have been authorized by Congress, and after the organized land militia of any arm or class shall have been called into the military service of the United States, volunteers of that particular arm or class may be raised and accepted into said service in accordance with the terms of this act regardless of the extent to which other arms or classes of said militia shall have been called into said service.

SEC. 4. That the volunteer forces shall be subject to the laws, orders, and regulations governing the Regular Army in so far as such laws, orders, and regulations are applicable to officers or enlisted men whose permanent retention in the military service, either on the active list or on the retired list, is not contemplated by existing law; and no distinction shall be made between the Regular Army, the Organized Militia while in the military service of the United States, and the volunteer forces in respect to promotion or to the conferring upon officers or enlisted men of brevet rank, medals of honor, certificates of merit, or other rewards for distinguished service, nor in respect to the eligibility of any officer of said Army, militia, or volunteer forces for service upon any court-martial, court of inquiry, or military commission: Provided, That the organization of all units of the line and of the signal troops of the volunteer forces shall be the same as that prescribed by law and regulations for the corresponding units of the Regular Army: Provided further, That when military conditions so require, the President may organize the land forces of the United States into brigades and divisions and such higher units as he may deem necessary, and the composition of units higher than the regiment shall be as he may prescribe: Provided further, That to each regiment of Infantry, Cavalry, and Artillery, and to each battalion of Engineers and Signal Corps troops organized under this act there shall be attached the same personnel of the Medical Department as are attached to like organizations of the Regular Army: Provided further, That the organization of the coast defenses, of machine-gun detachments, establishments of the Medical Department, remount depots, military trains, secret-service agencies, military prisons, lines of communication, including their supply depots, and of other adjuncts that may be necessary in the prosecution of war, and the organization of which is not otherwise provided for by law, shall be as the President may from time to time direct.

SEC. 5. That except as otherwise provided herein the President is authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint all volunteer officers required by this act, but the number and grade of such officers shall not exceed the number and grade of like officers provided for a like force of the Regular Army: Provided, That all appointments below the grade of brigadier general in the line of the volunteer forces shall be by commission in an arm of the service and not by commission in any particular regiment; and officers in each arm of the service shall be assigned to organizations of that arm, and transferred from one organization to another in that arm, as the interests of the service may require, by orders from the Secretary of War: Provided further, That no officer above the grade of colonel shall be appointed under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 6. That to provide the staff officers that will be necessary in the various staff corps and departments in time of war or while war is imminent, and that are not otherwise provided for in this act, the President is authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, such number of volunteer staff officers of grades authorized by law for the Regular Army as he may find necessary for such corps and departments: Provided, That the total number of such staff officers so appointed, including all such officers of the Organized Militia called into the military service of the United States, shall not exceed the ratio of 1 officer to 200 enlisted men for all militia and volunteer forces called into the military service of the United States: Provided further, That the number of volunteer staff officers appointed in any grade in the various staff corps and departments shall not exceed in any staff corps or department the proportionate strength of regular officers of the corresponding grade as established by law for the corresponding staff corps or department of the Regular Army: Provided further, That the President may appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, volunteer chaplains at the rate of one for each regiment of Volunteer Infantry, Cavalry, and Field Artillery, and one for every 12 companies of Volunteer Coast Artillery raised, with rank corresponding to that established by law for chaplains in the Regular Army.

SEC. 7. That in appointing the volunteer officers authorized by this act the President may select them from the Regular Army, from those duly qualified and registered pursuant to section 23 of the act of Congress approved January 21, 1903, from the country at large, from the organized land militia of the District of Columbia, and, upon the recommendation of the various governors, from the organized land militia of the several States and Territories in proportion, as far as practicable, to their respective populations, and as far as compatible with the interests of the military service, from the localities from which the troops with which the officers appointed upon said recommendation are to serve shall have been recruited: Provided, That in appointments from the country at large preference shall be given those who shall have had honorable service in the Regular Army, the National Guard, or the volunteer forces, or who shall have been graduated from educational institutions in which military instruction is compulsory: Provided further, That at the same time not to exceed one Regular Army officer shall hold a volunteer commission in any one battalion of volunteer engineers or signal troops, or in any one battalion of Volunteer Field Artillery; and not to exceed four Regular Army officers shall at the same time hold commissions in any one regiment of Volunteer Cavalry, Field Artillery, or Infantry, or in any 12 companies of Coast Artillery, including their field and staff: And provided further, That Regular Army officers appointed as officers of Volunteers under this act shall not thereby vacate their Regular Army commissions nor shall they be prejudiced in their relative or lineal standing therein by reason of their service under their volunteer commissions.

SEC. 8. That the temporary vacancies created in any grade not above that of colonel among the commissioned personnel of any arm, staff corps, or department of the Regular Army, through appointments of officers thereof to higher volunteer rank, shall be filled by temporary promotions, according to seniority in rank of officers holding commissions in the next lower grade in said arm, staff corps, or department; and all temporary vacancies created in any grade by temporary promotions shall in like manner be filled from, and thus create temporary vacancies in, the next lower grade; and the vacancies that remain thereafter in said arm, staff corps, or department, that can not be filled by temporary promotions, as prescribed in this section, may be filled by the temporary appointment of officers of such number and grade or grades as shall maintain said arm, corps, or department at the full commissioned strength authorized by law: Provided, That in the staff corps and departments subject to the provisions of sections 26 and 27 of the act of Congress approved February 2, 1901, and acts amendatory thereof, temporary vacancies that can not be filled by temporary promotions, as hereinbefore prescribed, shall be filled by temporary details made in the manner prescribed in said sections 26 and 27 and acts amendatory thereof, and the resulting temporary vacancies in the branches of the Army from which the details are so made shall be filled as hereinbefore in this section prescribed: Provided, That officers temporarily promoted or appointed under the terms of this section shall be so promoted or appointed by the Presiednt, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for terms that shall not extend beyond the termination of the war or, if war shall not occur, beyond the passing of the imminence thereof, as defined by the President's proclamation, and upon the expiration of said terms said officers shall be discharged from the positions held by them under their temporary promotions or appointments: Provided further, That officers temporarily promoted under the provisions of this section shall not vacate their permanent commissions, nor shall they be prejudiced in their lineal or relative standing in the Regular Army under permanent commissions, by reason of their services under temporary commissions authorized by this section.

SEC. 9. That all returns and muster rolls of organizations of the volunteer forces and of militia organizations while in the service of the United States shall be rendered to The Adjutant General of the Army, and upon the muster out of such organizations the records pertaining to them shall be transferred to and filed in The Adjutant General's Office. And regimental and all other medical officers serving with volunteer troops, or with militia organizations in the service of the United States, in the field or elsewhere, shall keep a daily record of all soldiers reported sick or wounded, as shown by the morning calls or reports, and shall deposit such reports, with other reports provided for in this section, in The Adjutant General's Office, as provided for herein for other reports, returns, and muster rolls.

SEC. 10. That in time of war or while war is imminent all organizations of the land forces in the military service of the United States shall be recruited and maintained as near their prescribed strength as practicable. For this purpose the necessary rendezvous and depots shall be established by the Secretary of War for the enlistment and training of all recruits, and in order that officers may be available for recruiting duty the President is authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint officers of Volunteers of the proper arm of the service, additional to those elsewhere herein authorized, in number not to exceed at the rate of 1 major, 4 captains, 5 first lieutenants, and 5 second lieutenants for each organized regiment of Cavalry, Field Artillery, or Infantry, each 3 battalions of Engineers, or each 12 companies of Coast Artillery; that for purposes of instruction and discipline the troops at recruit depots herein authorized may be organized into companies and battalions, at the discretion of the Secretary of War, with noncommissioned officers and privates of such grades and numbers as may be prescribed by the President. The recruit rendezvous and recruit depots herein prescribed shall be under the direct control of the Secretary of War, and shall render their reports and returns to The Adjutant General of the Army: Provided, That to maintain the organized land militia organizations in the military service of the United States at their maximum strength the recruiting rendezvous and depots in any State or Territory may, at the request of the governor thereof, enlist and train recruits for the organized land militia organizations in the service of the United States from said State or Territory.

SEC. 11. That in the organization of a recruiting system, after Congress shall have authorized the raising of volunteer forces, the President is authorized to employ retired officers, noncommissioned officers, and privates of the Regular Army, either with their rank on the retired list or, in the case of enlisted men, with increased noncommissioned rank; or he may, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint and employ retired officers below the grade of colonel, with increased volunteer commissioned rank not to exceed in the case of any officer one grade above that held by him upon the retired list, or retired enlisted men with volunteer commissioned rank not above the grade of first lieutenant: Provided, That retired officers and enlisted men while thus employed shall not be eligible for transfer to the field units, but shall receive the full pay and allowances of the respective grades in which they are serving, whether volunteer or regular, in lieu of their retired pay and allowances: Provided further, That upon the termination of the duty or, in case of those given volunteer rank, upon muster out as volunteers said retired officers and enlisted men shall revert to their retired status.

SEC. 12. That, except as otherwise specifically prescribed by law, all officers provided for in this act shall be subject to such assignments of duty and such transfers as the President may direct: Provided, That medical officers of Volunteers when detailed as consulting surgeons shall not exercise command over the hospitals to which they may be assigned for duty, except that by virtue of their commissions they may command all enlisted men: Provided further, That medical inspectors shall be detailed for duty with each army, field army, or army corps and division, and for the base and lines of communications, and that no officer shall be detailed for duty as a medical inspector except he be experienced in military sanitation.

SEC. 13. That all officers and enlisted men of the volunteer forces shall be in all respects on the same footing as to pay, allowances, and pensions as officers and enlisted men of corresponding grades in the Regular Army.

SEC. 14. That all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Approved, April 25, 1914.

Mr. HUGHES. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question at this point?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly.

Mr. HUGHES. I have been called from the Chamber once or twice, and the Senator may have already dealt with these matters. I have not heard him, however. In framing this plan, was any change made in the rate of pay of the enlisted man?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No, sir.

Mr. HUGHES. What is the rate of pay now?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Fifteen dollars a month on the first enlistment, and upon reenlistment it is increased so that the maximum he attains is $25 a month.

Mr. HUGHES. Has the committee given any consideration to the question as to whether or not the low pay of the soldier is in any way responsible for the disinclination to enlist in the Army, or to remain in the Army after enlistment?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say that the committee did not go into that subject, except in a very small way. There were a number of changes made, but not so far as the enlisted personnel is concerned.

Mr. HUGHES. I should like to ask the Senator another question, which I think is akin to that. What authority fixes the character or quantity of the rations supplied to the enlisted men of the Army?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The regulations of the War Department.

Mr. HUGHES. Who draws the regulations, and who finally decides on the matter?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Everything is approved by the Secretary of War.

Mr. HUGHES. And this legislation does not attempt to deal with that at all?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It does not attempt to change the present system with regard to that.

Mr. HUGHES. I do not know just what the enlisted man's ration consists of, but not very long ago it was sadly insufficient, in my opinion; and I have always believed that the character and quantity of the rations received by the enlisted men had a great deal to do with whatever dissatisfaction there was in the service. For instance, in my time there was no butter ration allowed to the enlisted man, no sugar, no milk. In other words, the enlisted man in the United States Army could not, under the regulations, be as well fed as the average mechanic's son in the average workingman's home in the United States of America. It always seemed to me that that was a matter of sufficient importance to engage the attention of the appropriate committees of the House and Senate. I do not think this very important matter should be left in the hands of any irresponsible authority. It seems to me it is of sufficient importance to engage the attention of the committee and of this body.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say that there has never been a suggestion of complaint by enlisted men or anybody else, so far as that is concerned, as to rations furnished these men; and my experience from personal contact with the situation is that they fare a good deal better than many of us do in our own home. I do not know but that there may be exceptional cases.

Mr. HUGHES. I assure the Senator if he is under that impression it is a very erroneous impression, because the Senator lives much better than it is possible for enlisted men to live. It is true that in barracks, by selling supplies and running a sort of denatured canteen, which is now permitted, the men directly contribute enough money to get fairly decent food under certain conditions. But I can go to my own experience. At one time I was served out a travel ration which consisted of hard biscuit and canned corned beef which nobody could eat. I do not know of anyone who has the hardihood to eat it more than once, on a hot day in the South in the summer time—the squash mess of canned corned feed which was poured out of the can and placed upon hard-tack. One of the traditions of the United States Army, which every other civilized nation has departed from, is that soldiers can not fight unless they have hard-tack. I think it was originally instituted as a sort of armor plate. In 1898 that was a part of the regular rations, and I believe that condition exists to-day.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not think the Senator ought to appeal to conditions which existed in 1898, which were concededly bad, so bad that I believe a later distinguished President of the United States got up a round robin that was applicable not only to the men but to the officers. But that is what we are trying to remedy now. It is to be in a position where we will not be unready for whatever may come, just as we were unready when a few days ago we set out in pursuit of a bandit down on the southern boundary line, and it took four or five or six days to get started. That is not the fault of the Army; it is the fault of Congress in failing to do its duty by the Army or the country, and it is that condition we are trying to correct here now.

I do not hear any complaint about the supplies furnished the troops or to officers of the Army. I have not heard of any desertions on that account.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Could not the Senator furnish to the Senate during the consideration of the bill from the War Department a statement of the kind of food which is furnished to the private soldier so that we may see just what it is?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I can do that; but it seems to me that the proper place for that would be in the supply bill when it comes up and not to undertake to incorporate that in a bill which has for its purpose the organization of the Army. I will undertake to furnish that information to the Senate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN subsequently submitted the following for insertion in the RECORD:

[Bulletin No. 21.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 28, 1914.

I. The following Executive order is published to the Army for the information and guidance of all concerned:

EXECUTIVE ORDER.

In accordance with the provisions of section 40 of the act entitled "An act to increase the efficiency of the permanent Military Establishment of the United States," approved February 2, 1901, which authorizes the President to "prescribe the kinds and quantities of the component articles of the Army ration, and to direct the issue of substitutive equivalent articles in place of any such components whenever, in his opinion, economy and a due regard to the health and comfort of the troops may so require," the Executive order of January 11, 1911, as amended by Executive orders of January 21, 1913, and July 15, 1913, prescribing the Army ration is revoked, and the following is promulgated for the information and guidance of all concerned, to take effect June 1, 1914.

The kinds and quantities of the component articles of the Army ration and the substitutive equivalent articles which may be issued in place of such components shall be as follows:

1. GARRISON RATION.

Component articles and quantities.		Substitutive articles and quantities.
Beef, fresh....oz..	20	Mutton, fresh....oz..	20

[1] In Alaska, 16 ounces of bacon, or, when desired, 16 ounces salt pork or 22 ounces salt beef.

[2] In Alaska the allowance of fresh vegetables will be 24 ounces instead of 20 ounces, or canned potatoes, 18 ounces instead of 15 ounces.

NOTE.—Food for troops traveling on U. S. Army transports will be prepared from the articles of subsistence stores which compose the ration for troops in garrison, varied by the substitution of other articles of authorized subsistence stores, the total daily cost per man of the food consumed not to exceed 20 per cent more than the current cost of the garrison ration, except on Thanksgiving Day and Christmas, when 60 per cent increase over the same current cost is authorized.

2. TRAVEL RATION (FOR TROOPS TRAVELING OTHERWISE THAN BY MARCHING, AND SEPARATED FROM COOKING FACILITIES).

Component articles and quantities.		Substitutive articles and quantities.
Soft bread....oz..	18	Hard bread....oz..	16
Beef, corned....oz..	12	Hash, corned beef....oz..	12
Beans, baked..oz..	4
Tomatoes, canned, oz....	8
Jam....oz..	1.4
Coffee, roasted and ground....oz..	1.12
Sugar....oz..	2.4
Milk, evaporated, unsweetened.oz..	.5

3. RESERVE RATION.

Component articles and quantities.		Substitutive articles and quantities.
Bacon....oz..	12
or canned meat, oz....	16
Hard bread....oz..	16
Coffee, roasted and ground....oz..	1.12
Sugar....oz..	2.4
Salt....oz..	.16

4. FIELD RATION.

The field ration is the ration prescribed in orders by the commander of the field forces. It consists of the reserve ration in whole or in part, supplemented by articles of food requisitioned or purchased locally or shipped from the rear, provided such supplements or substitutes correspond generally with the component articles or substitutive equivalents of the garrison ration.

5. EMERGENCY RATION.

An emergency ration, prepared under the direction of the War Department, will be issued, in addition to the regular ration, as required for troops on active campaign or in the field for purposes of instruction, and will not be opened except by order of an officer or in extremity. Company and detachment commanders are responsible for the proper care and use of emergency rations carried on the person of the soldier.

6. SAVINGS.

All articles of the garrison and travel ration due a company, or other organization, will be retained by the quartermaster and credit given to the organization for the money value of these articles at the current price of the articles; and the quartermaster will pay as savings to the organization commanders any excess in value of the stores so retained over those purchased by the organization. Such savings shall be used solely for the purchase of articles of food.

In time of peace the ration-savings privilege, with the exception hereinafter noted, will be suspended for troops on the march. The ration to be issued to troops on the march in time of peace will be prescribed by the commander and will not exceed the allowances prescribed for the garrison ration. When so ordered by such commander, the savings privilege on certain specified articles of the ration will be allowed.

Upon arrival of troops at mobilization or concentration camps the ration-savings privilege will be suspended and entirely replaced by issue of rations in kind. This same restriction holds during the period of field operations.

II. General Orders, No. 15, War Department, 1911; paragraph 2, Bulletin No. 5; and Bulletin No. 28, War Department, 1913, relative to executive orders pertaining to the Army ration, are rescinded.

[2163024 C—A. G. O.]

By order of the Secretary of War.

W. W. WOTHERSPOON,
Major General, Chief of Staff.

Official:

GEO. ANDREWS,
The Adjutant General.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, another defect in the present system—and I think everybody realizes it—is the absence of officers from their organizations. The law authorizes the detachment of 200 officers for work with the agricultural colleges where military training is had and with the National Guard of the several States, and yet 600 are detached for that service and there are still demands made upon the department for a detail of these officers for duty in connection with the schools of the country.

This bill, Mr. President, corrects that. It will authorize the detail of more men from the Army for the purpose of instructing the young men in the schools of the country. So in this bill we undertake to provide for the present lack of officers on the theory that no organization can be properly trained that is not amply provided with experienced officers, and the Senate bill provides a sufficient number of extra officers for the many details to the National Guard, colleges, and so forth, contemplated by existing law, thus leaving the necessary complement of officers with the company and battalion units.

I have heard some distinguished gentlemen insist that all this legislation was for the benefit of Army officers and not for the men; that we have too many officers now, and we ought not to increase the number. Yet I venture to say the records of the War Department will show that some of these same gentlemen have frequently been appealing to the Secretary of War to have Army officers detailed for service at the schools of their States or with the National Guard of their States. The bill undertakes to cure that defect by increasing the number of extra officers.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will it interfere any with the Senator's remarks if as he goes along and gives a detail of the committee bill he would also give us an idea as to what the bill passed by the House provided on that same subject?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I would not hesitate to do that, but it would consume an immense amount of time. I have, with the assistance of the gentlemen who have been assisting me, taken the House bill as a basis for legislation in the Senate as though it were the bill that was pending here, and I have left in it in roman letters the provisions of the House bill which were in exact accord with the Senate bill or varied very little from it, and added the Senate provision as an amendment in italics. But to undertake to discuss each of these changes now would take a good deal of time, and I think it would be better, if the Senator will pardon me, to take that up when the provisions of the bill are reached.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well, if the Senator prefers that course. I think we ought to have a comparison between the two bills, because that is eventually what we will be called to vote upon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I would a little rather not do that until we reach the provisions of the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. I will not ask the Senator to do it now.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say to the Senator every bit of it will come up again when we reach the discussion of the bill in the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to ask a question for information right here. Has the Senator any information as to how many men there are in this country who, in the last 15 years, have been honorably discharged from the Army who were enlisted men and who, if we had war to-day, could be called upon?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not think there is any possible way under the sun to reach a conclusion as to the number.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is there not some way by which we could learn how many men, in the last 15 years, were honorably discharged from the Army?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The report of The Adjutant General shows that about 15,000 men go out each year.

Mr. OVERMAN. So that in 10 years there would be 150,000?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. Those men would be competent as to age if they volunteered for service. What is the limit of age at which they are taken in the Army?

Mr. DU PONT. Not all of them would be competent. Some were discharged on account of disabilities.

Mr. OVERMAN. If there were at least 150,000 men in the last 10 years who have been honorably discharged from the Army and who were capable of doing service, can we not ascertain exactly what number would be available?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think the history of the country shows that they do not rally to the colors very rapidly when they are needed. They did not in the Spanish-American War, and I do not think in any previous wars. As a matter of fact, I think the military history of the country will show that men leave the colors as soon as their enlistment expires, even if it is on the eve of battle, and that they do not come back at all.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will ask the Senator if any attempt is made by the department to keep track of the whereabouts of men who have been discharged?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No; I do not know of any provision of law under which the Government could keep in touch with those men. As I stated awhile ago, we have undertaken by the pending bill to make men feel after serving this period of enlistment they will still be a part of the Army, and we undertake to pay each $24 a year. It is not much, but I believe that it will be enough to induce every man who went into the service to keep in touch with the Government.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. May I ask the Senator, while he is on that question, do I understand that the bill which the Senator reports makes no provision by which a soldier may, without his own consent, be retired and go on the reserve list?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not understand the Senator's question.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. As I understand it, at the end of two years the soldier has his option to remain in the Army.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Or go on the reserve.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. He may go on the reserve list. At the end of his period of enlistment he may reenlist. There is no limit on the number of times he may reenlist.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; you mean to reenlist in the Regular Army?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. DU PONT. After four years he goes to the reserve.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. He can reenlist in the Army.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. As many times as he pleases within the age limit.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. So there is no provision by which he may be retired and go upon the reserve list so long as he choses to remain in the Regular Army.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No, sir. The acceptance of his enlistment depends on the authorities. They can decline to let him reenlist if there is any disqualification in the man, either morally or physically or mentally.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That would probably disqualify him from becoming a member of the reserve.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir. Mr. President, I have discussed the principal changes that have been made in the organization, and I want to discuss very briefly the principal changes in the Infantry and Cavalry and the Field Artillery. This bill provides for a headquarters company, a supply company, and a machine-gun company to each regiment of Infantry and Cavalry, and a headquarters company and a supply company to each regiment of Field Artillery. I am going to call the attention of the Senate to the purpose of that change so that Senators may see it affects the strength of the company organization, because these men who did this duty formerly either came out of the Quartermaster's Corps or out of the company enrollment of enlisted men.

The object of the headquarters company is to furnish an organization in which will be collected, under the command of the adjutant, all the personnel necessary to perform the regimental duties of administration, and is made to include the band, the regimental orderlies, headquarters clerks, and so forth. It will have charge of the records and of the preparation of all reports and returns required of the regiment. So in the very nature of things these details under the present system reduce the combatant force.

For purposes of administration and for properly caring for the pay and supply of the regiment and of all papers, funds, and property pertaining thereto, it is proposed to combine all the regimental personnel charged with these functions into a supply company, under the command of the quartermaster. It will include the drivers of vehicles, the clerks and noncommissioned personnel necessary for paying and supplying the regiment. It seemed to be the general opinion that the personnel of this company should belong to the regiments and not to any staff corps, and therefore the former plan has been adopted.

The machine-gun company, it goes without saying, ought to be one of the best trained arms of the service. Yet under the organization as it exists now the men who man the machine guns are taken from the enlisted personnel, thus depleting the fighting strength of the company.

Mr. NORRIS. Under the bill proposed by the committee will not the ordinary private soldier be drilled in the use and handling of machine guns?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Oh, yes; but if you take 10, 15, or 20 or more men of the Infantry force to man machine guns, you have depleted your fighting strength in that branch of the service; and they are dependent on each other.

Mr. NORRIS. I thought, the way the Senator expressed it, the bill provided for specially trained men, and that the ordinary enlisted man would not therefore get any practice in the use of machine guns.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Oh, they will get practice in all these branches, but it is just like the coast defense service. It is an expert service. A man might learn something about handling a gun in the coast defense if he is in the Infantry somewhere, but the man who in the last analysis must do the work is the man who has been there all the time and knows every part and piece of machinery necessary to manipulate the guns.

Mr. LODGE. Is it not true, I will ask the Senator, that machine-gun companies or corps are in the modern army in Europe to-day separate from infantry and cavalry?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They are. It is a fact.

Mr. LODGE. It is a separate organization?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is. We have made it to conform with the modern fighting machine. The instruction of the personnel charged with this weapon is so essentially different from that of the other companies of the regiment that such companies should be permanent and self-contained, as are the other companies of the regiment. The proposed company will be armed with six machine guns, with one extra gun in case of breakage.

Mr. THOMPSON. How many companies are to be provided with the machine guns?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. One for each regiment.

Mr. President, I think I have in a general way covered the changes that have been made as affecting the Regular Army. There is no essential change in the Cavalry, except an addition in the organization proper of this regular branch of the service.

I have called attention particularly to the changes that have been made in the personnel.

Another feature of this bill, Mr. President, is the provision that is put in it for the military training in our colleges and universities. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] introduced a bill here, known as the Pomerene bill, which was carefully prepared by him with the assistance of gentlemen who were connected with these schools and who have in recent times advocated the training of the young men in the schools and universities.

That bill impressed the committee as one of the most progressive steps toward the proper military training of the young men of the country, and we engrafted it, almost without change, in this bill. Some of the gentlemen who had assisted in its preparation appeared before the committee, and I personally, aside from that, had a number of discussions with them. There is nothing compulsory about it.

My personal view, Mr. President, if I may digress, is that the best way to train the young men of the country is to teach them that with the rights of citizenship go the duties of service to the country and the adoption of some sort of compulsory military training. There is not any reason in the world why every young man in this country should not be taught to understand that he owes a duty to his country in time of need.

Mr. POMERENE. If I may make a suggestion, has it not been demonstrated during the present European war that one of the weaknesses of the system prevailing, for instance, in Great Britain is that they did not have sufficient officers with whom to train their soldiers?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. POMERENE. It was partly to meet that defect that the bill to which the Senator refers was prepared.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I believe from the investigations I have made that in the five years after a system of compulsory training—and by that I do not mean compulsory service—was engrafted upon the statutes of our country you could absolutely do away with the largest part of the standing army and retain only what was necessary for a police force. However, that is aside from this bill, and I do not care to get into a discussion of it.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator speaks of compulsory training. Does the Senator think that would be a practicable proposition as a matter of legislation?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have not any doubt of it. I introduced a bill modeled after the Australian system and engrafted into it a part of the Swiss system, and it is now pending before the Committee on Military Affairs. I realize the great prejudice that exists against it. I do not know why. It does not involve military service, except in so far as training may be, and it comes at a time in a young man's life when it assists him in his physical as well as in his mental development, and does not differ essentially from the requirements that are usual in the gymnasia of the best schools of the country.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon says that the country is not ripe for universal military training. The country will never be ripe for it unless it is educated, unless people are educated to the benefits that might be derived from it, will it? What does the Senator think would ripen the country to a conception of the necessity of it?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Two years' military training in the schools of the country.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What does the Senator think is necessary in order to bring public opinion to a realization of that conception?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I may have misjudged the sentiment of the country; I hope I have; but there has always been more or less of prejudice against it, and friends of mine on this side of the Chamber who oppose it—I do not know that they oppose it in public speech—forget that Jefferson advocated it, that Washington advocated it, and that many of the great Democrats as well as great Republicans of this country have advocated some sort of compulsory military training.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from Oregon has no doubt that the country would ripen up quickly enough if it was necessary for the defense of the country, has he?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. President, this military training in schools for the purpose of creating and training officers for the reserve corps is an innovation which I think ought to appeal very strongly to the Senate. It trains officers who go into the officers' reserve corps and their services can be called into requisition in case of emergency.

There is another proposition that is in this bill, Mr. President, that goes a long way to train the civilian for the duties that his country may demand at his hands, and that is as to railroad men, telegraphers, hospital attendants, wireless operators, aviators, chauffeurs, powder experts, technical men in civil life of every kind. There is a provision in the bill that enables them to come into the reserve corps if they want to. They do not have to do so; it is not compulsory; but a very distinguished engineer of New York—Mr. Parsons—came before the committee and showed that there were hundreds of splendidly equipped young engineers in this country who would be glad to go into the reserve corps, just as there are thousands of young doctors and dentists who would be glad to go into the reserve and to serve their country whenever they may happen to be needed.

I venture to say that under this provision of the bill, if it is enacted by Congress, these young engineers and others all over the country will enter the reserve corps, and when they are needed they will take the place of and assist the engineers in the Engineer Corps of the Army. They are brilliant young men, and many of them have been educated at the military schools of the country.

Mr. President, there is a provision in the bill for an increase in the Aviation Service and also in the Field Artillery. Both of those services are inadequate under the law as it now stands. I am not criticizing the personnel of the Aviation Service any more than I have been criticizing the personnel of the enlisted men or the commissioned men of the Army, but the Aviation Service is notoriously weak. That is not the fault of the personnel particularly, but it is the fault of a Government that is unwilling to appropriate the money to give these men the necessary equipment to properly serve their country. Take the aeroplanes south of us on the border, Mr. President, and I think out of four or five which undertook to cross the desert in pursuit of Villa two went down to earth.

Mr. BORAH. And the machine guns did not work, I understand.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The machine guns would not work, I am informed. It is not the fault of the Army that that condition exists. There is not a better esprit de corps among any body of men than that which exists in the Army and Navy of the United States.

Mr. LODGE. I will ask the Senator from Oregon, is it not true that the aeroplanes which we have in Mexico carry only one man?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think it is true.

Mr. LODGE. And every aeroplane of the thousands which are being used in Europe carries a pilot and an observer?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. And in some instances they also carry tons of explosives.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; and they are armored.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes. A Senator asks me sotto voce, Who is responsible if it is not the Aviation Corps? I say Congress is responsible. I tried to get the Secretary of War a year ago to submit a plan for the reorganization of the Army so that Congress might assume a responsibility and act upon a responsibility which the Constitution devolves upon it, and I now venture to say that, in the discussion of this bill and in the discussion of appropriation bills when they come up here, you will find Senators—distinguished Senators on this floor—protesting against burdening the people of this country with taxation for the support of the Army, and claiming that it is against the spirit of our institutions. The pacifist is here in the land, vociferous in his demands that no money shall be spent for the organization or the maintenance of an army, although the very life of our country may be at stake.

It is said that we shall never have any more wars. God grant that that may be true; no man would dislike to see war more than would I. Although I was a very young man, I can very distinctly remember the raiding parties of first one army and then another going across my father's plantation in the Southland and taking whatever was in sight as the legitimate prey of war. Nobody wants war any less than I do; but no man can tell what may happen to this country within 24 hours.

Who could have predicted the blowing up of the Maine and the taking unto ourselves of Cuba and the Philippines, and becoming at one step a world power, Mr. President? I am perfectly willing to leave the settlement of the Mexican question to our distinguished President, who knows the situation and who, I know, wants to do what is best to do for the country; but no man can tell where that trouble is going to lead us.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We certainly need some good aeroplanes down there.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. We certainly need some aeroplanes and evidently we need some troops.

I for one will never consent, so long as I am at the head of the Military Affairs Committee, that the young men of our country shall, without some preparation, be enlisted and enrolled and sent to certain death in the event of an invasion or an attack by any first-class military power.

Washington said—and we ought to give him credit for knowing what he was talking about—that if he were compelled to state what the facts were about an untrained soldiery, whether they were a benefit or a disadvantage, he would have to say truthfully that they were a disadvantage rather than a benefit to their country.

So you will find, Mr. President, I will say, in answer to the Senator's question, that when we come to discuss the Army appropriation bill some of our good friends here—and I have no criticism of them—will be insisting that we ought not appropriate this money, and that it is a burden upon the American people.

If I may be permitted to digress just for a moment from the subject in hand, I will say that not only have we become a world power, Mr. President, by reason of stretching our wings across the Pacific, over the Philippines, the Sandwich Islands, the Panama Canal, and Porto Rico, and exercising a care over other countries adjoining us, but the United States seems more strongly disposed now than ever to assert the Monroe doctrine and to make it become more than a mere paper doctrine. Where does that lead us? I hope it may not involve us in trouble; but if we do undertake to assert it, we must be prepared to do so by something more than by mere word of mouth. That requires more men and a reorganized Army and Navy.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator has called our attention to the declaration of Washington as to the practical uselessness of an untrained army. I think we had an object lesson in that at the first Battle of Bull Run, which I very well remember, and we have had an object lesson in unpreparedness from the fact that six days elapsed after the murderous raid of Villa and his bandits at Columbus before our troops crossed the frontier.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is no doubt about the Senator's statement of the fact.

Mr. GALLINGER. I fully agree with the Senator that we need preparedness and that it ought to be of sufficient magnitude to protect us from disaster that may come to us at any moment if we are not prepared.

I was attracted by the observation of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] that we need aeroplanes. I believe that we have two dilapidated aeroplanes left, but we have not a single aeroplane, and have not had a single aeroplane, that has been equipped with what France and Germany have placed on their aeroplanes, to enable them to become real instruments of war. Two of our aviators were lost in Mexico. They ought to have had an instrument in their aeroplanes to have told them something as to where they were drifting, but such aeroplanes as we have had have been all of the commonest, rudest kind, and mostly they have gone to destruction.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not think there is any question about that, Mr. President.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, some time ago I brought to the city of Washington and introduced to the officer in charge of the Aviation Corps a young man, whose name I have forgotten for the moment, but who was a professional flier. He was interested in a plant in the city of Paterson which was manufacturing armored aeroplanes. He had the drawings of an aeroplane, heavily armored and able to carry a pilot, an observer, and a machine-gun operator, as I recollect. He asked me to introduce him to the proper authorities in order that he might learn what the plans of the Government were in connection with the development of the aeroplane service. He wanted to become a Government flier. Subsequently he went to Europe and achieved considerable distinction in his operations over there.

I do not know what the situation is now; but the head of the aeroplane service at that time told me that there were not more than a dozen men in the United States who could fly across country, and there were hardly any of them, as I understood, in the service. He condemned at once the proposition that this young man laid before him. He said the Government was not operating along those lines; and, as I recollect, he said it was for the reason that we did not have the men. It does not seem to me that it makes much difference how many aeroplanes we may have if we have not the pilots to fly them.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There are plenty of men in civil life who could pilot them.

Mr. HUGHES. I do not think there are many such men available in civil life. The officer asked the young man whom I took to the department to enumerate the men whom he knew who were competent for this service. The young man replied, "I will fly; I will fly down here from Paterson and light in the War College grounds, or anywhere you say, in this machine, which I should like to sell to the Government and operate for the Government." The officer again asked how many men are there who will fly across country now. The young man enumerated one or two, and then the officer counted them off, and said they had left the country or were under some other disability, and that morning they could not get hold of or count on 12 men in the whole United States who could fly across country.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have had some information to the effect that under the present state of the law it will be impossible to give these experienced fliers the status of a soldier, so that if one of them were to meet with any mishap while serving the country it would simply be as an individual.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is correct, only they get a little higher pay in that service; that is all.

Mr. HUGHES. They get about $1,200 or $1,500 a year, I think.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They get better pay; but I do not think $10,000 a year would induce me to go up in one of our present aeroplanes.

Mr. HUGHES. I do not think it would induce me to go up in one of them either.

Mr. POMERENE. If I may further ask the Senator a question, my information also is to the effect that the principal difficulty with our present aeroplanes is with the engines; that they are of very inferior mechanism, and for that reason more than for any other they have not been rendering the service which is desired in Mexico.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I really do not know the reason for it; I know that they come down when they go up, and pretty suddenly sometimes. I am not machinist or expert enough to know the reason, but that is the condition; and I know this, too, as a member of the Appropriations Committee of the Senate, and, Mr. President, it is an old story: Officers of the Ordnance Department and of the Signal Corps have come before the committee and told the committee time and time again—not once, but dozens of times—about our needs of artillery, our deficiency in ammunition, aeroplanes, and in everything else; but Congress will not appropriate the necessary money to accomplish what is needed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I wish to say with reference to the operators of flying machines that I know that in a number of instances there have been young officers who were anxious to be assigned to such work that they might practice and have the experience, but they were not given the opportunity. I think we have not had the machines; they have been defective as to their engines; we have not had a sufficient number and have not appropriated enough to give the skilled officers of the Army an opportunity to test them out and to gain the experience which, I am satisfied, they would quickly gain if they had the opportunity. I believe they would be as expert as anybody if we gave them a chance.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not think there is any doubt about that. The deficiency of our aeroplane service has been brought touchingly home to me within the very recent past. The Senate will remember the case of a young midshipman of the Navy, a young Portland, Oreg., boy, who died while at the academy. There was a great difference of opinion as to how he met his death, and there were some who insist, and with some reason, that he was killed. His young brother at West Point graduated a short while ago and was detailed for duty in the aviation service. After he had become an expert he went up in one of these defective machines with a brother officer. On its way up the machine fell a distance of 600 feet or more, and killed the young man who accompanied my young Oregon friend, very seriously injuring the latter. That is the thing we are sending our young men up against at San Diego and other places in the United States.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, as I remember, six young officers have lost their lives at the San Diego training station within the last few years, and it has generally been said that it was the result of defective machinery.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not think there is any doubt about it; we have had it called to our attention.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, do we not pay as much for these machines as other nations do? And why is it that the machine that we are using in this country should be so defective? Machine for machine we pay more, do we not?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think probably we pay as much as anybody.

Mr. KENYON. Why are they defective?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There are a good many reasons for it, I will say to the Senator. In the first place, the service is given too small an appropriation to buy first-class machines. They try to make a small appropriation do a great deal more than it is capable of doing.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I will suggest that perhaps the fault is not entirely with Congress. There are some investigations, I think, now being made, or which shortly will be made, with regard to the efficiency as well as the conduct of the Aviation Corps at San Diego.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think possibly that may develop something; I hope it will; I hope it will develop enough to make Congress realize the importance of giving this matter proper attention. But, Mr. President, I am taking more time than I expected, and more time than I would have taken if I had been permitted to proceed without interruption.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I expect the Senator will consume the remainder of the day.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am not going to do so.

Mr. President, referring again to the proposition of our friends who are opposed to doing anything toward increasing the strength of our Army, who say that we do not need a larger Army, that we are not going to have any war, and that after the war in Europe is over there will be no nation that can war with us, I wish to say that I have not any prophecies or predictions to make with reference to what may happen as to an invasion from a European country; but I do want to call attention to one pertinent fact:

After the Civil War was over, and we had lost billions in wealth and millions in lives of the flower and chivalry of the North and South, there was no better Army on the face of the globe than those old veterans who survived the war and there was not a power on the face of the earth that could have successfully confronted them. They were willing to go anywhere, and they did talk about going somewhere, at the behest of the country; but fortunately they did not have to go.

Then, in this connection, some people talk about "cultivating a military spirit"—"a militaristic spirit, indeed." Mr. President, let us remember Gen. Grant received the sword of Lee in surrender at Appomattox and tendered it back to him with a grace that won the plaudits of the world, and told his comrades in arms to go back and till their fields and their farms, and every man of them went back and tried to revive the country that had been devastated by the ruthless hand of war. And so with the old soldiers, Mr. President, on the northern side. They went back and were absorbed into the useful life of this Republic, and we have four or more of them here to-day, survivors of the Union side, and three of whom are members of the Military Affairs Committee and one, I believe, of the southern side, living useful lives and maintaining the very best traditions of our country.

Mr. President, I would rather have a militaristic spirit, if you please, than to have a spirit which makes us bend to every yoke that may be pressed upon our shoulders. There has been a tendency here to destroy, not a militaristic spirit, which does not exist in our country, but to destroy the martial and patriotic spirit which every free people must have if they would assert their rights, and only their rights, and be prepared to enforce their just demands when occasion requires.

Mr. President, there are two other propositions in this bill to which I am going to call attention. The first is the creation of a volunteer force that is exclusively under Federal control. The Secretary of War had a so-called continental army plan. It did not seem to meet with the approval of the country generally, and when the Secretary of War was on the stand I asked him if he could not eliminate the detailed provisions in the continental army scheme so as to narrow it down to a scope where it would be easy of enforcement and accomplishment. The Secretary tried it and got it in very much better shape. The committee was not quarreling with the Secretary of War. We were all trying to get something to meet the emergencies and to place our country in a proper position of defense. That did not work. We could not hammer that into such shape, and we were weeks in trying to do that; but finally, and through the assistance of the Judge Advocate General of the Army, in a very few lines we provided for the organization of a volunteer force, exclusively under Federal control, that it seems to the committee and to the country, so far as I have been able to judge from reading the newspapers, meets with the approval of the people, and I call your attention to it.

It has been pretty generally recognized that the volunteer act of 1914, approved April 25, 1914, is one of the best pieces of constructive military legislation that the Congress ever passed. My old friend, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT], framed the bill in the first instance, and it failed of passage, I believe, and subsequently it was adopted in the House. It was introduced in the House in terms very much like the bill as it finally became the law.

Now, Mr. President, that volunteer act applies only in time of war. In trying to devise some system that would meet the situation we accepted that law as a basis for action in time of peace as well as in war, and the pending bill has that provision. It is very short, and I am going to read it to the Senate, so that you may see how easy it has been to create a force that is entirely under the jurisdiction of the War Department.

Section 56 provides:

The President is hereby authorized, at any time, to organize, maintain, and train, under the provisions of sections 3 to 12, both inclusive, of an act entitled "An act to provide for raising the volunteer forces of the United States in time of actual or threatened war," approved April 25, 1914, volunteer forces, not exceeding an average of 600 officers and enlisted men for each congressional district—

That would raise about 261,000 men—

The term of enlistment, which shall in no event be greater than that of the Regular Army, the period of service with the colors and with the reserve, and the period of training shall be as the President may prescribe, those passing to the reserve to have the status and obligations prescribed for reserves of the Regular Army. Officers and enlisted men of the volunteer forces raised under the provisions of this section shall be entitled to the pay and allowances of officers and enlisted men of corresponding grades in the Regular Army during periods of training only.

Temporary appointments and promotions of officers of the Regular Army arising from the operation of this section may be terminated at the discretion of the President.

Officers of the Regular Army who receive commissions in the Volunteer Army herein authorized shall in time of peace receive the pay and allowances of their respective grades in the Regular Army, and no more.

Mr. President, the adoption of that portion of the volunteer act recognizes the desire and meets the wishes evinced by the young men all over this country to join in summer camps and drill. They have recently had an encampment up at Plattsburg. They are now talking of organizing a training camp in California and other camps in other parts of the country, so as to meet the wishes of these gentlemen, who have been the strong advocates of this plan, combining the pleasures of a summer vacation with the most strenuous kind of work, because they work 8 and 10 hours a day when they do go into these training camps for 25 or 30 days at a time. These would all come under this provision and become enlisted soldiers of the United States, ready for service.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, does this provision authorize the President in time of peace to take practically 261,000 more soldiers into the Army?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Oh, no; just for training purposes, and only for a limited time.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. What is the difference between this section and the existing law?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. We have not any law on that subject.

Mr. CUMMINS. The section refers to the law of 1914.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Oh! The Senator means, what is the difference between the law as it stands to-day and the act of 1914?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I mean, what is the difference between this section and the act of 1914, to which reference is made in the section?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The act of 1914 provides, in the very first section, that these men shall be utilized only in time of war.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Oregon just answered the Senator from Georgia that this section did not authorize the President to enlist 261,000 men in time of peace.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I may have been mistaken about that statement.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; I probably am.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it authorizes the President to enlist these men at any time and to maintain them——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. As long as he sees fit.

Mr. CUMMINS. As long as he sees fit to maintain them; and in that lies the difference between this section and the act of 1914, which limited the right of the President to enlist the men to a time of war or threatened war.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. This, without any limitation, as written, practically puts it in the power of the President to add 261,000 more men to the Army.

Mr. CUMMINS. This section has no limitation, either as to the conditions under which men may be called into the service or as to the length of time during any year for which they may be required to render service.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And, practically, the President could add to the Army under this provision 261,000 soldiers.

Mr. DU PONT. Without pay.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, no; they receive the same pay that other soldiers do.

Mr. DU PONT. Only when they are in training.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. When the President has them with the Army; and he can have them there all the time he wishes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think probably the Senator from Iowa is correct. I have not read that provision critically for some time, and I may be mistaken in my view about it; but there ought to be some limitation in that regard, if the Senator is correct about it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope it will not be thought that I speak in a hostile way.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I understand the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am opposed to the section; but I want the National Guard enlarged so that it will accommodate the whole desire which the Senator from Oregon has in view.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Of course, these sections and provisions of the bill will come up for discussion from time to time, and there may be many suggestions like that now that have not crossed my mind. I had not thought of it. My recollection was that it limited it to particular times; but the Senator may be entirely correct; and if so, there ought to be some limitation. But that will now organize, with proper limitations, if you please, a volunteer force that is completely under Federal control.

The suggestion of this, Mr. President, brings up the same question that has been the bone of contention ever since the country was organized, and that is the war between the militia, so called, and a purely Federal force. I have not any fear of that fight. I say that the Congress of the United States ought to determine this matter once and for all, so as to have a dependable force.

Why, Mr. President, we remember the history that we learned in our schools. We read about the heroism of our ancestors, and they were heroic; there is not any question about that. We read about the magnificent victories that were accomplished, from Bunker Hill to Yorktown. We hear that all the time. I never heard of anything else but the successes of our troops in the Revolutionary period; and the victories that they did accomplish were the most remarkable victories and accomplished under terrible circumstances. We do not read about the defeats, Mr. President, between Bunker Hill and Yorktown. We do not read about the inefficiencies of our system. There has been that constant war between the States and the Nation with regard to an organized force. Here were some States paying enormous bounties to their men in the Revolutionary days, and the Government itself was paying bounties. Each was bidding against the other as to which should have the services of the men. Short-time enlistments were in vogue. I do not wonder, Mr. President, that Washington got down on his knees in the snow at Valley Forge and prayed for divine assistance. He could not get it from the Continental Congress.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon must recognize, however, that the Government of the United States at this moment bears very little resemblance to the Government under which Washington fought the War of the Revolution, and that the rights of the Colonies or States during that war were very different from the rights of the States under the Constitution.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Oh, yes; of course I understand that; and there is a very great difference between the militia of that day, as it was enlisted, and the organized National Guard of to-day.

Mr. CUMMINS. I only desire to state that in my opinion—and I intend to try to make it good before the debate is over—Congress has just as much power over the National Guard as it has over the Army, with just one exception, namely, the right of the States to appoint the officers, just as in the great part of the German Army the Empire does not appoint the officers, and no one has ever felt that the Empire was weak in its authority over the German Army.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I want to call attention to the fact that while we had the so-called State militia or National Guard in all the Northern States, or most of them, at the time of the Civil War, I never knew of an instance where a regiment of National Guards, as such, bodily enlisted in the Army of the United States. Our Volunteer Army was formed by individual enlistments. I never knew of a case where a militia regiment or a militia company, as an organization, bodily entered the United States Army.

Mr. OVERMAN. Oh, yes; that was done.

Mr. NELSON. They simply enlisted as individuals during the days of the Civil War.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, even if that was true, it was simply because Congress did not exercise the power it had under the Constitution.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to say that that was not true in the South.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hope we will not get into a discussion of the merits or demerits of the National Guard in the consideration of this question, Mr. President.

Mr. NELSON. I will say to the Senator from North Carolina that I did not intend to refer to the South.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, with some limitations, that might be put in this bill, if it is as broad as the Senator suggests—and we will ascertain that in the discussion of it—I think we are prepared for the organization of a splendid Federal force.

The only other matter to which I desire to call attention is this——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What does the Senator estimate that force is to cost annually—I mean the force provided for under section 56?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the Senator will turn to page 25 of the report of the committee on the original bill he will find the costs estimated. Does the Senator want me to state them, or will a reference to the report be sufficient?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I thought it would be interesting to have the Senator include that statement in his remarks at this time, if he cares to do so.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The cost of volunteers for the first year would be $24,000,000—I am just going to state it in round numbers—for the second year $31,000,000, for the third year $39,000,000, for the fourth year $47,000,000, and annually thereafter $27,000,000. That includes, if the Senator will note, new and other equipment that will be necessary.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It was contemplated that those sums should be spent upon this volunteer army?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. For 30 days' service a year?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. For 30 days' service a year. That shows the understanding of the committee with reference to this bill. We all thought it only applied to that.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I want to ask the Senator a question before he leaves the subject of the National Guard. What is the present outlay for the National Guard, under the present law, upon the part of the Federal Government?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say to the Senator that I have not the exact figures here, but they are something like seven or eight million dollars.

Mr. BORAH. How much does the Senator's bill increase the expenditure on the part of the Federal Government?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir——

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Pardon me; just let me answer that question. The National Guard under the present bill for the first year is $46,000,000 in round numbers, for the second year $50,000,000, for the third year $40,000,000, for the fourth year $45,000,000, and $40,000,000 annually thereafter.

Mr. BORAH. That would be the expenditure under your proposed bill?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BORAH. What is the difference between the increase of expenditure under your bill and the increase of expenditure under the bill from the House?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not think ours increases it very much. I think we decrease it. I have a statement here right on that point that I will ask to have inserted in the RECORD showing the cost.

I am going to have it inserted in the RECORD so that they may stand in conjunction—the cost of the National Guard, Table 11 of the Senate committee's report, and a statement showing the cost of the National Guard under House bill 12766.

I will state that the cost of the National Guard the first year will be under the bill passed by the House in round numbers $42,000,000, as compared with $46,000,000 under our bill; the second year it will cost $47,000,000, as compared with $50,000,000 under our bill; the third year it will cost $58,000,000, as compared with our $40,000,000. For the fourth year it will cost $77,000,000, as compared with our $45,000,000, and annually thereafter under the House bill it will cost $53,550,000 and under the Senate bill $40,873,000.

I will ask that the tables be printed in conjunction with each other.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

The tables referred to are as follows:

Mr. CUMMINS. In stating the estimated cost of the Volunteer force I think the Senator from Oregon ought to state the basis on which the estimate is made—that is, the length of time.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Thirty days.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not understand that he had included that element.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It includes the equipment, you must understand.

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly, but they are in camp for only 30 days in the year.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator from Oregon yield for a question?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The recent estimate of annual cost is for 261,000 Federal Volunteers. May I ask the Senator if that estimate is made with a view in mind of having a proportionate number of Cavalry and Field Artillery, with horses and complete equipment?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Does not the report answer the question of the Senator?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No, sir.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am not sure what enters into that ascertainment. It was made in the War Department.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If the Senator will permit me, the point is this: The National Guard includes cavalry and field artillery, with the maintenance of horses in considerable numbers. That is the case to-day, and it will be much greater the case if the bill should pass in its present form. Yet the National Guard is to cost $40,000,000. Now, the Volunteers are to be in excess of the National Guard in numbers, but are to cost only $27,000,000. I can not see how they can keep a mounted organization under such an estimate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Of course, I do not know what is embraced in it, but under the act of 1914, which is adopted by the committee's provision in the bill, the President, I think, can organize those forces just as he sees fit.

Mr. DU PONT. There is nothing to prevent the President from organizing as many Artillery and Cavalry organizations as he pleases.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Could he maintain them in those proportions for $27,000,000 a year?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is only for 30 days.

Mr. WADSWORTH. What is to become of the horses for the other 11 months? That is the point.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I wish to ask the Senator how many men are contemplated, in Table 12, in the first year's estimate for the cost of volunteers?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It seems to me that that table covers the whole business, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. How many men are estimated for?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The whole number.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. The whole maximum?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Two hundred and sixty-one thousand.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. The whole maximum number possible?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. President, nothing remains to call the attention of the Senate to except the National Guard. I fully agree with the Senator from Iowa that the difficulties which have existed with reference to the National Guard have been not due to any lack of power in the General Government to legislate with reference to it, but it has been a lack of the exercise of that power by Congress. We have, as some people are pleased to say, 48 little armies throughout the United States, all acting under different jurisdictions and without any regard to each other. But, Mr. President, that is because Congress has not exercised its power. I claim with the Senator that if Congress will only exercise the power, it has almost as complete jurisdiction to do as it pleases with the National Guard as it has with the organized Regular troops, with the exception only of the appointment of officers.

Now, we have undertaken in this bill to exhaust all the power the Federal Government has under the Constitution and to so limit the power of appointment of officers that even that will be measureably a Federal force. This, I will say, is the arbitrary action of the committee, but it is done after consultation with the National Guard officers and the authorities of the States who are anxious to become as useful a component part of the armed establishment as it is possible for them to be. They have given us every assistance possible and are willing to do whatever Congress feels is necessary for them to do, and which can be constitutionally done to make them to all practical purposes a Federal force.

Mr. BORAH rose.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Does the Senator want to interrupt me?

Mr. BORAH. The Senator said that under the Constitution the National Government has the same power over the National Guard it has over the Army except as to appointing officers. What force and effect and scope does the Senator give to the clause "and also the training of the National Guard"?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Training "under the discipline prescribed by Congress."

Mr. BORAH. Exactly. You can prescribe discipline and it is left to the State officers to train them. But to prescribe a form of discipline amounts to nothing unless it is carried out, and whether it shall be carried out depends upon the State.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the power to discipline and train these State troops prescribed by Congress, it seems to me, carries with it the power to do everything that you could do with the National Guard.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; but it is left to the State to train the National Guard. Now, Congress can prescribe the discipline. If they are trained they must be trained according to the discipline, but the initiative is upon the part of the State as to whether or not it shall train the National Guard.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Suppose they do not do it.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; suppose they do not.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They go out.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely, and there is where the danger lies. There is the weakness—the breakdown.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am speaking of the laws as they exist now. Let me call the Senator's attention to the fact that we have prescribed rules and methods that will subject these men to court-martial proceedings and the Articles of War.

Mr. BORAH. I agree with the Senator. You have exhausted the powers of the National Government, and I think perhaps overdrawn.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It may be so. I hope we have.

Mr. BORAH. But the point with me is that undoubtedly the appointment of officers belongs to the State. My observation and my reading lead me to believe that those officers will be appointed as a result of political preference.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. We tried to avoid that, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. I know you have; but, with all due deference to the ability of the committee and the great zeal and ingenuity the committee has manifested and exercised in regard to it, it seems to me it is impossible to avoid it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I differ from the Senator; but the courts would have to determine in the final analysis.

Mr. BORAH. The court has determined the basic principles.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let me say this to the Senator: If I am not very much mistaken in my recollection of the conditions in reference to the civil-service law, I think the law as it was first passed was upset by the Supreme Court on the theory that it deprived the President of the constitutional power of appointment. So to correct that the law was amended so as not to deprive the President of the appointing power, and the commission is required to certify up three instead of one. It looks like a distinction without a difference. They certify up three, and the President takes one of the three. The power of selection is preserved.

Mr. BORAH. But does the Senator make no distinction as between the limiting of the power of the President to appoint a Federal officer and the limiting of the power of separate sovereignty in the reserved right to appoint officers?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator and I read the constitutional provisions and look at them from a different viewpoint.

Mr. President, as I said a while ago, notwithstanding the decision of the Attorney General of the United States, Mr. Wickersham, under the Taft administration; notwithstanding the opinion of The Adjutant General, who is a very distinguished man; notwithstanding the views of a great many distinguished men in the country to the contrary, I believe that Congress has unlimited control over the National Guard, except in the matter of the appointment of officers.

Mr. BORAH. Suppose Congress should pass a law providing that the governor of a State should be limited to three men in the appointment of chief justice of the State. Could we pass such a law, assuming that was an appointive office?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Of course not. I have not any doubt on that point.

Here again is the difference that I talked about a while ago, Mr. President—Federal and State control. It has made inefficient the Military Establishment of this country from the earliest days. It has been due to this hairsplitting—and I am not referring to the Senator's argument, because I know the Senator never indulges in that—but because of the hairsplitting differences of distinguished men in the past, as to the jurisdiction that the Congress and the State has over this subject.

Mr. BORAH. The Supreme Court has decided very explicitly that the power of appointment is plainly and exclusively with the State. That has been settled not only by the plain terms of the Constitution but by the decision of the court. If that is true, I do not believe that it is within the power of the National Government to say that the governor of a State shall appoint one of three men. That would unquestionably be a limitation on the power of the State. I do not believe Congress can limit that power. It was a power belonging to the States without limit, and no part of it was delegated to the National Government. I am speaking now of the power to appoint the officers.

Mr. DU PONT. The bill does not say that. The bill says that the Government will not pay any officer unless appointed after a certain examination.

Mr. BORAH. That is an effort to get around the Constitution through the persuasive power of money, and is neither constitutionally or morally very attractive.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator—and the Senator's experience will vindicate the statement I make—it is said the Constitution follows the flag, and it does. It has followed it into jurisdictions and into countries and territories where no man ever conceived it would have to go; but it goes.

Mr. President, if this question has to be determined by the Supreme Court of the United States or any court when there is an emergency confronting our people, I have not any doubt about what it will hold.

Mr. BORAH. That is just exactly what happened in 1812. The Supreme Court of Massachusetts and the Supreme Court of Connecticut held that the power to determine what should constitute an emergency justifying the calling out of the militia rested with the State. Twelve years after the war was over the Supreme Court of the United States reversed that opinion; but the war was over.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I should be very sorry if this constitutional question prejudices the minds of Senators against the National Guard in this early stage of the discussion upon the bill. I know there is a widespread prejudice against it, but we begin the whole subject with a false provision. We look upon the militia as State troops. They are not State troops. There is no such thing as a State militia any more than a national militia. The Constitution does not say anything about a State militia. The Constitution describes these troops as militia, and when they are organized they are not State troops, they are national troops, if they are organized under the power of Congress.

I agree that the Constitution reserves to the States the power to appoint officers, and I do not dispute the view just expressed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] that we can not limit or affect the power of appointment. But the moment the officers are appointed they may become, if Congress so wills, not State officers but Federal officers. They command a Federal force and are just as much subject to the lawful orders of the President of the United States as would be an officer of the Regular Army. That is my view of it.

If an officer of the National Guard should receive at the same time an order from the governor and an order from the President and those orders were inconsistent with each other, then he must obey the order of the President because the Federal law is the supreme law of the land.

The question of how far we can influence the choice made by the States in appointing officers of the National Guard is a very interesting inquiry, but I hope that Senators will not make up their minds finally until the whole subject is fully discussed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hope Senators will not get up a discussion on this point, because I want to get through.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield, and to whom?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. As the Senator from Georgia rose first, I yield to him.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I want to ask the Senator from Iowa a question. I want his opinion as to how far under the power of organizing and arming and disciplining the militia the National Government has the right to prescribe the qualifications of officers. The governor could select them; but if the National Government can organize, arm, and discipline and prescribe the rules, could it not prescribe qualifications for the officers without the power of selecting them?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I prefer to answer that question later in the debate. I will say, however, I have serious doubt about the congressional power to limit directly in any way the discretion or authority of the State in the appointment of officers.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I now yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. As supplemental to what the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has said, I wish to suggest that a part of the fears that have been expressed here about the appointment of the officers of the State militia will not be realized. I wish to add to what the Senator from Oregon has already said that we must face, the utilization of the National Guard with reference to existing conditions. I know—and I say this for whatever it may be worth—the organizations of the National Guard in States of very reputable size whose officers are not only not appointed for political reasons but they endure through administration after administration, the same officers being affiliated with the political party that is in the minority. Politics does not have any place whatever in the organization or in the management of the State National Guard. On the contrary, politics has been entirely eliminated. The same adjutant general has served, to my certain knowledge, in some of the National Guard organizations for more than 14 years, although the present adjutant general in one State is of an entirely different political party from that of the governor of the State. On the contrary, instead of the fears of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] being realized, I think under existing conditions, where the training is under the inspection or the immediate eye of the officers of the Regular Army, the tendency has been to eliminate politics everywhere and to go to a strictly military organization.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think, probably, that is largely true, though in some instances it exists.

Mr. President, I want to apologize to the Senate for having taken so much time. I did not intend to trespass on the time of the Senate so long; but I have stated in a very general way the provisions of the bill and the purposes sought to be accomplished by the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator explain to us a little further the object and the use of the increased expenditure for the National Guard, and, if he recalls it, exactly the difference between his plan for the National Guard and the plan of the bill as passed by the House? I want to say to the Senator I am very sure every Senator present is gratified at the time he has taken and is deriving real benefit from it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I thank the Senator.

One thing that occasions the difference between the House and Senate bills as to the National Guard is due to the fact that the House committee increases the number to about 800 for a congressional district and we increase it to 500.

Now, Mr. President, in conclusion I ask to have inserted in the RECORD the following summary of the maximum and minimum strength of the Army under Senate bill 4840 and under House bill 17766 as passed by the House. That will give a comparative statement for reference which will be available to Senators in the discussion of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield, Mr. President.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator has been speaking of the National Guard. A matter was called to my attention this morning that I should like to have an explanation of from the chairman of the committee. Section 108 of the bill provides that—

> Commissioned officers on the active list belonging to organizations of the National Guard shall annually receive as reimbursement for their expenses and compensation for their services, except during periods of service for which under existing law they may become entitled to the same pay as officers of corresponding grades of the Regular Army, at the following rates, namely: To captains commanding companies or similar units, $500; to first lieutenants of companies or similar units, $300; to second lieutenants of companies or similar units, $250.

As this section is framed it would seem that any officer in the National Guard above the rank of captain would not receive any compensation from the Federal Government at all. I confess I do not see the justice of saying that a man shall be paid for his services while a member of the National Guard so long as he is of the rank of captain or below that rank, but if he should have a rank above that of captain he shall not receive any compensation.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will state that the committee purposely struck out pay for officers above the rank of captain on the theory that in the National Guard, as it is at present organized, the captains are the working force of the unit. The company is the working unit. In some States, however, that hardly applies. I know at one time in my State we had a brigadier general and about three or four companies over which he presided. There was not any use for such an officer as that. The probability is that these higher ranking officers will be necessary in most of the States, I mean below the grade of brigadier general, but we limited it to the captain, assuming that he was the working factor in the development and training of the troops.

Mr. POMERENE. I want to say that so far as the National Guard in Ohio is concerned the men who do as much if not more work than the captains themselves are the colonels and lieutenant colonels. They have an immense amount of correspondence, and they provide their own stenographers usually. It does seem to me they should be entitled to at least the compensation which the committee in its wisdom has seen fit to give to a captain.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They get a captain's pay.

Mr. POMERENE. Under the provisions of the bill they would not get anything from the Federal Government.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I thought it meant that while they hold a higher rank the pay was not to go higher than that of a captain.

Mr. POMERENE. That was the provision of the bill as it passed the House, but it has been changed by the Senate committee so that an officer might be above the rank of captain and he would not get any pay at all from the Federal Government.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will state that any officer of higher rank should, in my opinion, have the pay of a captain.

Mr. POMERENE. That is my judgment about it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I say to the Senator from Ohio that when these National Guards go into encampment the higher officers are paid exactly as Army officers are paid, and that is where they do most of their work, where they have brigades.

Mr. POMERENE. They have a vast deal of detail work to do during the entire year, whether in camp or not.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say to the Senator that that can come up by way of amendment when we reach that provision of the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Before the Senator from Oregon takes his seat I should like to ask him one question. He may have answered it while I was out of the Chamber. What are the circumstances under which the President can increase the Regular Army to 250,000?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The distinction is between peace and war or when war is imminent.

Mr. CUMMINS. The President is limited——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. He is limited in time of peace.

Mr. CUMMINS. In peace he is limited to the number of men provided in the bill substantially.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir; practically two-thirds of the maximum strength.

I now ask that the bill be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment of the committee in the nature of a substitute.

The SECRETARY. The Committee on Military Affairs reports to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause and in lieu thereof to insert:

That the Army of the United States shall consist of the Regular Army, the Volunteer Army, the Officers' Reserve Corps, the National Guard while in the service of the United States, and such other land forces as Congress may from time to time authorize.

SEC. 2. Composition of the Regular Army: The Regular Army of the United States, including the existing organizations, shall consist of 64 regiments of Infantry, 25 regiments of Cavalry, 21 regiments of Field Artillery, a Coast Artillery Corps, the brigade, division, corps, and Army headquarters, with their detachments and troops, a General Staff Corps, an Adjutant General's Department, an Inspector General's Department, a Judge Advocate General's Department, a Quartermaster Corps, a Medical Department, a Corps of Engineers, an Ordnance Department, a Signal Corps, the officers of the Bureau of Insular Affairs, the detached officers, the chaplains, the veterinarians, the Regular Army Reserve, all organized as hereinafter provided, and the following as now authorized by law: The officers and enlisted men on the retired list; the additional officers; the professors, the Corps of Cadets, the general Army service detachment, and detachments of Cavalry, Field Artillery, and Engineers, and the band of the United States Military Academy; the post noncommissioned staff officers; the recruiting parties, the recruit-depot detachments, and unassigned recruits; the service-school detachments; the disciplinary guards; the disciplinary organizations; the Indian Scouts; and such other officers and enlisted men as may be hereinafter provided for.

SEC. 3. Composition of brigades, divisions, etc.: The mobile troops of the Regular Army of the United States shall be organized, as far as practicable, into brigades and divisions. The President is authorized, in time of actual or threatened hostilities, or when in his opinion the interests of the public service demand it, to organize the brigades and divisions into such corps or armies as may be necessary. The typical Infantry brigade shall consist of a headquarters and three regiments of Infantry. The typical Cavalry brigade shall consist of a headquarters and three regiments of Cavalry. The typical Field Artillery brigade shall consist of a headquarters and three regiments of Field Artillery. The typical Infantry division shall consist of a headquarters, three Infantry brigades, one regiment of Cavalry, one Field Artillery brigade, one regiment of Engineers, one field battalion of Signal Corps, one aero squadron, one ammunition train, one supply train, one engineer train, and one sanitary train. The typical Cavalry division shall consist of a headquarters, three Cavalry Brigades, one regiment of Field Artillery (horse), one battalion of mounted engineers, one field signal battalion (mounted), one aero squadron, one ammunition train, one supply train, one engineer train, and one sanitary train. The typical corps shall consist of a headquarters, two or more Infantry divisions, one or more Cavalry brigades or a Cavalry division, one Field Artillery brigade, one telegraph battalion, and one field signal battalion, and such ammunition, supply, engineer, and sanitary trains as the President may deem necessary. Nothing herein contained, however, shall prevent the President from increasing or decreasing the number of organizations prescribed for the typical brigades, divisions, and corps, or from prescribing new and different organizations and personnel as the efficiency of the service may require.

SEC. 4. Headquarters personnel of higher tactical units and trains: The brigade headquarters shall consist of such officers, enlisted men, and civilians as the President may prescribe. The typical headquarters of an Infantry, Cavalry, or Field Artillery brigade shall consist of 1 brigadier general, 1 adjutant, 2 aids (lieutenants), 1 sergeant, 1 cook, 6 privates and 1 wagoner. A division headquarters shall consist of such officers, enlisted men, and civilians as the President may prescribe. The typical Infantry and Cavalry division headquarters shall consist of 1 major general, 1 chief of staff, 1 adjutant, 1 inspector, 1 judge advocate, 1 quartermaster, 1 surgeon, 1 ordnance officer, 1 signal officer, 1 sanitary inspector, 2 assistants to the chief of staff, 4 assistants to the quartermaster, 1 assistant to the surgeon, 3 aids (captains or lieutenants), 1 headquarters troop, consisting of 1 captain, 1 first lieutenant, 1 second lieutenant, 1 first sergeant, 1 mess sergeant, 1 supply sergeant, 1 stable sergeant, 5 sergeants, 8 corporals, 2 horseshoers, 1 saddler, 2 cooks, 2 buglers, 1 mechanic, 14 privates first class, and 43 privates, and a quartermaster detachment of 5 sergeants first class, 5 sergeants, and 5 wagoners. Officers for the headquarters troop shall be detailed from the Cavalry Arm, and when detailed such details shall be subject to the provisions of section 27, act of Congress approved February 2, 1901. A corps or army headquarters shall consist of such officers, enlisted men, and civilians as the President may prescribe.

Each supply train, ammunition train, sanitary train, and engineer train shall consist of such officers and enlisted men and shall be organized as the President may prescribe, the line officers necessary therewith to be detailed under the provisions of sections 26 and 27, act of Congress approved February 2, 1901.

SEC. 5. General officers of the line: There shall be appointed, as now provided by law, including 6 major generals and 15 brigadier generals now holding commissions as general officers of the line of the Army, 10 major generals, of whom one shall be available for service as Chief of Staff and one to command each division; 37 brigadier generals, 3 of whom shall be available as assistants to the Chief of Staff: Provided, That hereafter in time of peace major general shall be appointed from officers of the grade of brigadier general, and brigadier generals shall be appointed from officers of the grade of colonel of the Regular Army.

SEC. 6. The General Staff Corps: The General Staff Corps shall consist of one Chief of Staff, detailed in time of peace from major generals of the line, who shall while so serving have the rank, pay, and allowances prescribed for a lieutenant general, and shall take rank and precedence over all other officers on the active list of the Army; 3 assistants to the Chief of Staff, brigadier generals, detailed in time of peace from the brigadier generals of the line, 1 of whom shall be the president of the Army War College and 1 of whom shall be Chief of the Division of Militia Affairs; 10 colonels; 12 lieutenant colonels; 32 majors; and 34 captains, to be detailed from corresponding grades in the Army under such rules of selection as the President may prescribe. If any officer so detailed shall be promoted to the next higher grade while so serving, the number of officers of the General Staff Corps in the grade to which he is promoted shall be increased by one for such time as the officer so promoted is an additional number in the advanced grade. The total number of officers detailed to the General Staff Corps shall at no time exceed the aggregate of the numbers herein specified for the several grades. All officers detailed in the General Staff Corps shall be detailed therein for periods of four years, unless sooner relieved. While serving in the General Staff Corps it shall be permitted to temporarily assign them to duty with any branch of the Army. Upon being relieved from duty in the General Staff Corps officers shall return to the branch of the Army in which they hold permanent commissions, and no officer shall be eligible to a further detail in the General Staff Corps until he has served two years with the branch of the Army in which commissioned, except in cases of national emergency or in time of war. Section 27 of the act of Congress, approved February 2, 1901, shall apply to each position vacated by officers below the grade of general officer detailed in the General Staff Corps. The Chief of Staff shall not serve as a member of any board of officers convened to select and recommend officers for detail in the General Staff Corps, and upon being relieved from duty as Chief of Staff by reason of expiration of tour, retirement, or other cause, the Chief of Staff shall revert to his permanent rank in the Regular Army.

SEC. 7. The Adjutant General's Department: The Adjutant General's Department shall consist of 1 Adjutant General, with the rank of brigadier general; 7 colonels; 13 lieutenant colonels; and 39 majors.

SEC. 8. The Inspector General's Department: The Inspector General's Department shall consist of 1 Inspector General, with the rank of brigadier general; 4 colonels; 8 lieutenant colonels; and 16 majors: Provided, That so much of the act approved June 23, 1874, as authorizes the detail of 4 officers of the line as acting inspectors general is hereby repealed.

SEC. 9. The Judge Advocate General's Department: The Judge Advocate General's Department shall consist of 1 Judge Advocate General, with the rank of brigadier general; 2 colonels; 6 lieutenant colonels; 12 majors; and 10 captains: Provided, That the duties of the Judge Advocate General's Department may include investigations necessary in the administration of military justice: Provided further, That acting judge advocates may be detailed under the provisions of existing law for separate brigades and for separate general court-martial jurisdictions, and when not immediately required for service with a geographical department, tactical division, separate brigade, or other separate general court-maritial jurisdiction, acting judge advocates may be assigned to such other legal duty as the exigencies of the service may require.

SEC. 10. The Quartermaster Corps: The Quartermaster Corps shall consist of 1 Quartermaster General with the rank of major general, 2 assistants to the Quartermaster General with the rank of brigadier general, 17 colonels, 30 lieutenant colonels, 54 majors, 155 captains, and the pay clerks now authorized by law. The total enlisted strength of the Quartermaster Corps and the number in each grade shall be limited and fixed from time to time by the President, in accordance with the needs of the Army, and shall consist of quartermaster sergeants, senior grade; quartermaster sergeants; sergeants, first class; sergeants; corporals; cooks; privates, first class; and privates. The number in the various grades shall not exceed the following percentages of the total authorized enlisted strength of the Quartermaster Corps, namely: Quartermaster sergeants, senior grade, three-tenths of 1 per cent; quartermaster sergeants, 7 per cent; sergeants, first class, 10 per cent; sergeants, 15 per cent; corporals, 10 per cent. The number of privates, first class, shall not exceed 25 per cent of the number of privates: Provided, That the master electricians now authorized by law for the Quartermaster Corps shall hereafter be known as quartermaster sergeants, senior grade, and shall be included in the number of quartermaster sergeants, senior grade, herein authorized: Provided further, That when vacancies occur in the office of Quartermaster General and in the office of either of the assistants to the Quartermaster General, by retirement of the present incumbents or otherwise, such vacancies shall not be filled, but the offices in which the vacancies occur shall cease and determine; and the Quartermaster General shall thereafter have the rank of brigadier general.

SEC. 11. The Medical Department: The Medical Department shall consist of the Medical Corps, the Dental Corps, the Medical Reserve Corps, and the Nurse Corps. The Medical Corps shall consist of 1 Surgeon General, with the rank of major general, 20 colonels, 40 lieutenant colonels, 214 majors, 622 captains or first lieutenants, and the enlisted men herein provided: Provided, That persons hereafter commissioned in the Medical Corps shall be promoted to the grade of captain upon the completion of five years' service in the Medical Corps and upon passing the examinations prescribed by the President for promotion to the grade of captain in the Medical Corps: Provided further, That captains in the Medical Corps shall take rank in that grade according to total length of commissioned service in the Medical Corps and as assistant surgeons in the Regular Army, subject, however, to loss of files by reason of sentence of general court-martial or of failure to qualify on examination for promotion: And provided further, That when a vacancy occurs in the office of Surgeon General, by retirement of the present incumbent or otherwise, such vacancy shall not be filled and such office, in the grade of major general, shall cease and determine; and the Surgeon General shall thereafter have the rank of brigadier general: And provided further, That hereafter the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to detail not more than three officers of the Medical Corps of the Army for duty with the military relief division of the American National Red Cross.

The Medical Reserve Corps and the Nurse Corps shall be as now provided by law. The Hospital Corps of the Army, as authorized and constituted by existing law, shall be designated and known as part of the Medical Corps of the Army. The total enlisted strength of the Medical Corps shall be limited and fixed from time to time by the President, in accordance with the needs of the Army, and shall consist of master hospital sergeants; hospital sergeants; sergeants, first class; sergeants; corporals; cooks; horseshoers; farriers; saddlers; mechanics; privates, first class; and privates. The numbers in the various grades shall not exceed the following percentages of the total authorized enlisted strength of the Medical Corps, namely: Master hospital sergeants, one-half of 1 per cent; hospital sergeants, one-half of 1 per cent; sergeants, first class, 7 per cent; sergeants, 11 per cent; corporals, 6 per cent. The number of cooks shall be limited and fixed from time to time by the Secretary of War. The number of horseshoers, farriers, saddlers, and mechanics shall be limited to one each for each regularly authorized field hospital company and one for each regularly authorized ambulance company. The number of privates, first class, shall not exceed 25 per cent of the number of privates.

The President is hereby authorized to appoint and commission, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, dental surgeons at the rate of 1 for each 1,000 enlisted men of the line of the Army. Dental surgeons shall have the pay and allowances of first lieutenants until they have completed 10 years' service. Dental surgeons of more than 10 but less than 25 years' service shall, subject to such examination as the President may prescribe, have the pay and allowances of captains. Dental surgeons of more than 25 years' service shall, subject to such examination as the President may prescribe, have the pay and allowances of major: Provided, That the total number of dental surgeons with pay and allowances of major shall not at any time exceed 15: And provided further, That all laws relating to the examination of officers of the Medical Corps for promotion shall be applicable to dental surgeons.

Authority is hereby given to the Secretary of War to grant permission, by revocable license, to the American National Red Cross to erect and maintain on any military reservations within the jurisdiction of the United States buildings suitable for the storage of supplies, or to occupy for that purpose buildings erected by the United States, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, such supplies to be available for the aid of the civilian population in case of serious national disaster.

SEC. 12. Corps of Engineers: The Corps of Engineers shall consist of 1 Chief of Engineers, with the rank of brigadier general: 23 colonels; 30 lieutenant colonels; 72 majors; 152 captains; 148 first lieutenants; 79 second lieutenants; and the enlisted men hereinafter enumerated. The Engineer troops of the Corps of Engineers shall consist of 1 band, 7 regiments, and 2 mounted battalions.

Each regiment of Engineers shall consist of 1 colonel; 1 lieutenant colonel; 2 majors; 11 captains; 12 first lieutenants; 6 second lieutenants; 2 master engineers, senior grade; 1 regimental sergeant major; 2 regimental supply sergeants; 2 color sergeants; 1 sergeant bugler; 1 cook; 1 wagoner for each authorized wagon of the field and combat train, and two battalions.

Each battalion of a regiment of Engineers shall consist of 1 major; 1 captain; 1 battalion sergeant major; 3 master engineers, junior grade; and three companies. Each Engineer company (regimental) shall consist of 1 captain; 2 first lieutenants; 1 second lieutenant; 1 first sergeant; 3 sergeants, first class; 1 mess sergeant; 1 supply sergeant; 1 stable sergeant; 6 sergeants; 12 corporals; 1 horseshoer; 2 buglers; 1 saddler; 2 cooks; 19 privates, first class; and 59 privates: Provided, That the President may, in his discretion, increase a regiment of Engineers by 2 master engineers, senior grade, and 2 sergeants; each battalion headquarters of a regiment of Engineers by 3 master engineers, junior grade; and each Engineer company (regimental) by 2 sergeants; 6 corporals; 1 cook; 12 privates, first class; and 34 privates.

The Engineer band shall consist of 1 band leader; 1 assistant band leader; 1 first sergeant; 2 band sergeants; 4 band corporals; 2 musicians, first class; 4 musicians, second class; 13 musicians, third class; and 2 cooks.

When no enlisted men of the Quartermaster Corps is attached for such positions, there shall be added to each mountain artillery headquarters company 1 packmaster (sergeant, first class), 1 assistant packmaster (sergeant), and 1 cargador (corporal).

Each supply company of a regiment of two battalions shall consist of 1 captain, 1 first lieutenant, 2 regimental supply sergeants, 1 first sergeant, 1 mess sergeant, 1 corporal, 1 cook, 1 horseshoer, 1 saddler, 2 privates, and 1 wagoner for each authorized wagon of the field train. When a regiment consists of three battalions there shall be added to the supply company 1 second lieutenant, 1 regimental supply sergeant, 1 private, and 1 wagoner for each additional authorized wagon of the field train.

Each gun or howitzer battalion shall consist of 1 major, 1 captain, and batteries as follows: Mountain artillery battalions and light artillery gun or howitzer battalions serving with the field artillery of Infantry divisions shall contain 3 batteries; horse artillery battalions and heavy field artillery gun or howitzer battalions shall contain 2 batteries: Provided, That the President may, in his discretion, increase the headquarters company of a regiment of two battalions by 2 sergeants, 5 corporals, 1 horseshoer, 1 mechanic, 1 private (first class), and 6 privates; the headquarters company of a regiment of three battalions by 1 sergeant, 7 corporals, 1 horseshoer, 1 mechanic, 2 cooks, 2 privates (first class), and 7 privates; the supply company of a regiment of two battalions by 1 corporal, 1 cook, 1 horseshoer, and 1 saddler; the supply company for a regiment of three battalions by 1 corporal, 1 cook, 1 horseshoer, and 1 saddler; a gun or howitzer battery by 3 sergeants, 7 corporals, 1 horseshoer, 2 mechanics, 1 bugler, 13 privates (first class), and 37 privates.

SEC. 22. Coast Artillery Corps: The Coast Artillery Corps shall consist of 1 Chief of Coast Artillery, with the rank of brigadier general; 24 colonels; 24 lieutenant colonels; 72 majors; 360 captains; 360 first lieutenants; 360 second lieutenants; 31 sergeants major, senior grade; 64 sergeants major, junior grade; 41 master electricians; 72 engineers; 99 electrician sergeants, first class; 275 assistant engineers; 99 electrician sergeants, second class; 106 firemen; 93 radio sergeants; 62 master gunners; 263 first sergeants; 263 supply sergeants; 263 mess sergeants; 1,784 sergeants; 2,516 corporals; 526 cooks; 526 mechanics; 526 buglers; 4,186 privates, first class; 12,562 privates; and 18 bands, organized as hereinbefore provided for the Engineer band. The rated men of the Coast Artillery Corps shall consist of casemate electricians; observers, first class; plotters; chief planters; coxswains; chief loaders; observers, second class; gun commanders and gun pointers. The total number of rated men shall not exceed 1,784. Coxswains shall receive $9 per month in addition to the pay of their grade: Provided, That the President may, in his discretion, increase the number of sergeants to 2,104, the number of corporals to 3,156, the number of privates, first class, to 5,225, and the number of privates to 15,675.

SEC. 23. Porto Rico Regiment of Infantry: The Porto Rico Regiment of Infantry shall be organized as provided herein for regiments of Infantry of the Regular Army.

The colonel and the lieutenant colonel of said regiment shall be detailed for four years by the President from officers of the Regular Army not below the rank of major, and the majors for like periods and from officers of the Regular Army not below the rank of captain, and, while so serving, officers so detailed shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of the grades to which they are detailed. The captains, first lieutenants, and second lieutenants shall be appointed and promoted, up to and including the rank of captain, as now provided by law, and nothing in this act shall be held or construed so as to deprive any officer of the Porto Rico regiment of the commission which he now holds therein, or of any right thereunder: Provided, That officers of the Porto Rico Regiment of Infantry promoted to the grade of captain since March 4, 1915, or hereafter so promoted, shall take rank on the relative list after all captains of said regiment who have been recommissioned as captains of Infantry.

All men enlisted in said regiment shall be citizens of Porto Rico, and hereafter all enlistments therein shall be as provided by this act for the Regular Army.

The pay and allowances of officers and enlisted men shall be the same as are provided by law for officers and enlisted men of like grades in the Regular Army.

The Porto Rico Regiment of Infantry, or organizations thereof, may be ordered for service outside of the island of Porto Rico, and the captains and lieutenants thereof shall be available for such detached service as the Secretary of War may direct; but vacancies created by officers so detached shall not be filled by promotions or appointments.

SEC. 24. All existing laws pertaining to or affecting the United States Military Academy and civilian or military personnel on duty thereat in any capacity whatever, the officers and enlisted men on the retired list, the detached and additional officers under the act of Congress approved March 3, 1911, recruiting parties, recruit depots and unassigned recruits, service-school detachments, United States disciplinary barracks guards, disciplinary organizations, the Philippine Scouts, and Indian scouts shall continue and remain in force except as herein specifically provided otherwise.

SEC. 25. Original appointments to be provisional: Original appointments in the Regular Army, except of cadets graduated from the United States Military Academy, shall be provisional for a period of two years, at the close of which period such appointment shall be made permanent, provided the provisional appointee shall have demonstrated under such regulations as the President may prescribe his physical, moral, and professional fitness for such permanent appointment. Should any officer holding a provisional appointment become eligible for promotion, and qualify therefor, before expiration of the period of two years from the date of his original appointment, he shall receive only a provisional appointment in such higher grade until he has qualified for permanent appointment, as prescribed above. Should any officer holding a provisional appointment fail to establish his physical, moral, and professional fitness for permanent appointment, as prescribed above, he shall be honorably discharged at or before the expiration of two years from the date of his original appointment, with six months' pay of his grade at date of discharge.

SEC. 26. Increase to be made in five increments: The increase in the commissioned and enlisted personnel of the Regular Army provided by this act shall be made in five annual increments, each of which shall be, in each grade of each arm, corps, department, and the detached officers, as nearly as practicable, one-fifth of the total increase authorized for each arm, corps, and department, and of the detached officers. Officers promoted to vacancies created or caused by the addition of the first increment shall be promoted to rank from July 1, 1916, and those promoted to vacancies created or caused by the second increment shall be promoted to rank from July 1, 1917; those promoted to vacancies created or caused by the addition of the third increment shall be promoted to rank from July 1, 1918; those promoted to vacancies created or caused by the addition of the fourth increment shall be promoted to rank from July 1, 1919; and those promoted to vacancies created or caused by the addition of the fifth increment shall be promoted to rank from July 1, 1920: Provided, That in the event of actual or threatened war or similar emergency in which the public safety demands it, the President is authorized to immediately organize the entire increase authorized by this act, or so much thereof as he may deem necessary.

Vacancies in the grade of second lieutenant occurring in any fiscal year shall be filled in the following order: First, from cadets graduated from the United States Military Academy; second, under the provisions of existing law, from enlisted men whose fitness for promotion shall have been determined by competitive examination; third, from members of the Officers' Reserve Corps hereinafter provided for between the ages of 21 and 27 years; fourth, from candidates from civil life between the ages of 21 and 27 years. The President is authorized to make the necessary rules and regulations to carry these provisions into effect: Provided, That appointments to the Corps of Engineers shall continue to be made as now provided by law, but that officers of the Army or Navy of the United States may become candidates for said appointments under the provisions of section 5 of the act approved February 27, 1911, without previously vacating their commissions as officers and without previously establishing eligibility for appointment as junior engineer under the Engineer Bureau of the War Department: Provided further, That the provisions of existing law requiring examinations to determine fitness for promotion of officers of the Army are hereby extended to include all grades below that of brigadier general: And provided further, That examinations of officers in the grades of major and lieutenant colonel shall be confined to problems involving the higher functions of staff duties and command.

SEC. 27. The detached officers: Line officers detached for duty with the National Guard, together with those detached from their proper commands under the provisions of law for other duty the usual period of which exceeds one year, shall be subject to the provisions of section 27 of the act approved February 2, 1901, with reference to details to the Staff Corps, but the total number of detached officers hereby made subject to these provisions shall not exceed 19 colonels, 23 lieutenant colonels, 165 majors, 389 captains, 426 first lieutenants, including 200 detached officers authorized by the act approved March 3, 1911.

SEC. 28. Retirement of officers of Philippine Scouts: Captains and lieutenants of Philippine Scouts who are citizens of the United States shall hereafter be entitled to retirement under the laws governing the retirement of enlisted men of the Regular Army, except that they shall be retired in the grade held by them at the date of retirement, shall be entitled to retirement for disability under the same conditions as officers of the Regular Army, and that they shall receive, as retired pay, the amounts allowed by law, as retired pay and allowances, of master signal electricians of the United States Army, and no more: Provided, That double time for service beyond the continental limits of the United States shall not be counted for the purposes of this section so as to reduce the actual period of service below 25 years: Provided further, That former officers of the Philippine Scouts who, because of disability occasioned by wounds received in action, have resigned or been discharged from the service, or who have heretofore served as such for a period of more than five years and have been retired as enlisted men, shall be placed upon the retired list as officers of Philippine Scouts and thereafter receive the retired pay and allowances provided by this section for other officers of Philippine Scouts: And provided further, That any former officer of Philippine Scouts who vacated his office in the Philippine Scouts by discharge or resignation on account of disability contracted in the line of duty and who was subsequently retired as an enlisted man, and any former officer of Philippine Scouts who has been retired as an enlisted man by special act of Congress, shall be transferred to the retired list created by this section, and shall thereafter receive the retired pay and allowances authorized by this section, and no more. Officers of Philippine Scouts retired under the provisions of this section shall not form part of the limited retired list now authorized by law.

SEC. 29. Enlistments in the Regular Army: On and after the 1st day of July, 1916, all enlistments in the Regular Army shall be for a term of seven years, the first four years to be in the active service with a branch of which those enlisted form a part and, except as otherwise provided herein, the last three years in the Regular Army reserve hereinafter provided for. After the expiration of two years' service in a first or subsequent enlistment, enlisted men serving within the continental limits of the United States shall, except in time of actual or threatened hostilities, upon their own applications, be furloughed to the Regular Army reserve in the grade in which then serving, or may, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, be reenlisted for a period of seven years: Provided, That after the expiration of one year's honorable service any enlisted man serving within the continental limits of the United States whose company, troop, battery, or detachment commander shall report him as proficient and sufficiently trained may, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, be furloughed to the Regular Army reserve under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, but no man furloughed to the reserve shall be eligible to reenlist in the service until the expiration of his term of seven years: Provided further, That in all enlistments hereafter accomplished under the provisions of this act four years shall be counted as an enlistment period in computing continuous-service pay: And provided further, That whenever, in his opinion, the interests of the service require it, the President is hereby authorized to establish, in time of peace, recruit rendezvous and depots for the Regular Army, in part or in whole, as provided by section 10 of the act approved April 25, 1914, to provide for raising the Volunteer forces of the United States in time of actual or threatened war: And provided further, That the President is authorized to utilize the services of postmasters of the second, third, and fourth classes in procuring the enlistment of recruits for the Army, and for each accepted recruit the postmaster procuring his enlistment shall receive the sum of $5. Postmasters may be authorized, under such regulations as the President may prescribe, to forward, at the expense of the United States, to designated recruit rendezvous such applicants for enlistment as may have satisfactorily passed a preliminary physical examination prescribed by the Secretary of War and conducted by an officer of the Medical Reserve Corps or a civilian physician designated for that duty by the Secretary of War; and for each accepted recruit examined by them officers of the Medical Reserve Corps and civilian physicians designated for the duty of examining applicants for enlistment shall receive the sum of $3.

SEC. 30. Pay of certain enlisted men in first enlistment: Hereafter the monthly pay of enlisted men of certain grades of the Army created in this act, during first enlistment, shall be as follows, namely: Quartermaster sergeant, senior grade, Quartermaster Corps; master hospital sergeant, Medical Corps; master engineer, senior grade, Corps of Engineers; and band leader, Infantry, Cavalry, Artillery, and Corps of Engineers, $75; hospital sergeant, Medical Corps; and master engineer, junior grade, Corps of Engineers, $65; sergeant, first class, Corps of Engineers; regimental supply sergeant, Infantry, Cavalry, Field Artillery, and Corps of Engineers; battalion supply sergeant, Corps of Engineers; and assistant engineer, Coast Artillery Corps, $45; assistant band leader, Infantry, Cavalry, Artillery, and Corps of Engineers; and sergeant bugler, Infantry, Cavalry, Artillery, and Corps of Engineers, $40; musician, first class, Infantry, Cavalry, Artillery, and Corps of Engineers, $36; supply sergeant, Infantry and Cavalry, Artillery, and Corps of Engineers; mess sergeant, Infantry, Cavalry, Artillery, and Corps of Engineers; cook, Medical Corps; horseshoer, Infantry, Cavalry, Artillery, Corps of Engineers, Signal Corps, and Medical Corps; stable sergeant, Infantry, Cavalry, and Corps of Engineers; radio sergeant, Coast Artillery Corps; and musicians, second class, Infantry, Cavalry, Artillery, and Corps of Engineers, $30; musician, third class, Infantry, Cavalry, Artillery, and Corps of Engineers, $24; saddler, Infantry, Cavalry, Field Artillery, Corps of Engineers, and Medical Corps; mechanic, Infantry, Cavalry, and Field Artillery, and Medical Corps; and wagoner, Infantry, Field Artillery, and Corps of Engineers, $21; private, first class, Infantry, Cavalry, and Artillery, $18; bugler, $15. Nothing herein contained shall operate to reduce the pay or allowances now authorized by law for any grade of enlisted men of the Army.

SEC. 31. Final discharge of enlisted men: No enlisted man in the Regular Army shall receive his final discharge until the termination of his seven-year term of enlistment except upon reenlistment, as provided for in this act or as provided by law for discharge prior to expiration of term of enlistment, but when an enlisted man is furloughed to the Regular Army reserve his accounts shall be closed, and he shall be paid in full to the date such furlough becomes effective, including transportation in kind and subsistence as now provided by law for discharged soldiers: Provided, That when by reason of death or disability of a member of the family of an enlisted man occurring after his enlistment members of his family become dependent upon him for support, he may, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, be discharged from the service of the United States or be furloughed to the Regular Army reserve, upon due proof being made of such condition.

SEC. 32. Composition of the Regular Army reserve: The Regular Army reserve shall consist of first, all enlisted men now in the Army reserve or who shall hereafter become members of the Army reserve under the provisions of existing law; second, all enlisted men furloughed to or enlisted in the Regular Army reserve under the provisions of this act; third, any person holding an honorable discharge from the Regular Army with character reported at least good who is physically qualified for the duties of a soldier and not over 45 years of age who enlists in the Regular Army reserve for a period of four years; and, fourth, any person who is a citizen of the United States or who has declared his intention of becoming a citizen thereof, who, by the nature of his civil occupation or profession, is qualified for duty in the Quartermaster, Engineer, or Signal Corps, or in the Medical or Ordnance Departments, and who is physically qualified for the duties of a soldier and is between 18 and 45 years of age, who enlists in the Regular Army reserve for one of said corps or departments for a period of four years.

SEC. 33. That the President is authorized to assign members of the Regular Army reserve as reserves to particular organizations of the Regular Army, or to organize the Regular Army reserve, or any part thereof, into units or detachments of any arm, corps, or department in such manner as he may perscribe, and to assign to such units and detachments officers of the Regular Army or of the Officers' Reserve Corps herein provided for; and in the event of actual or threatened hostilities he may mobilize the Regular Army reserve in such manner as he may determine, and thereafter retain it, or any part thereof, in active service for such period as he may determine the conditions demand: Provided, That all enlistments in the Regular Army, including those in the Regular Army reserve, which are in force on the date of the outbreak of war shall continue in force for one year, unless sooner terminated by order of the Secretary of War, but nothing herein shall be construed to shorten the time of enlistment prescribed: Provided further, That subject to such regulations as the President may prescribe for their proper identification and location, the members of the Regular Army reserve found physically fit for service shall be paid semiannually and at the rate of $24 a year while in the reserve.

SEC. 34. Regular Army reserve in time of war: When mobilized by order of the President the members of the Regular Army reserve shall, so long as they may remain in active service, receive the pay and allowances of enlisted men of the Regular Army of like grades: Provided, That any enlisted man who shall have reenlisted in the Regular Army reserve shall receive during such active service the additional pay now provided by law for enlisted men in his arm of the service in the second enlistment period: Provided further, That members of the Regular Army reserve shall receive the actual necessary cost of transportation and subsistence from their homes to the places at which they may be ordered to report for duty: And provided further, That service in the Regular Army reserve shall confer no right to retirement or retired pay, and members of the Regular Army reserve shall become entitled to pension only through disability incurred while on active duty in the service of the United States.

SEC. 35. Use of other departments of the Government: The President may, subject to such rules and regulations as in his judgment may be necessary, utilize the services of members and employees of all departments of the Government of the United States, without expense to the individual reservist, for keeping in touch with, paying, and mobilizing the Regular Army reserve.

SEC. 36. Reenlistment in time of war: For the purpose of utilizing as an auxiliary to the Regular Army reserve the services of men who have had experience and training in the Regular Army, the President may, in time of actual or threatened hostilities, by proclamation or otherwise, call upon honorably discharged soldiers of the Regular Army to present themselves for reenlistment therein; and any person who shall have been honorably discharged from said Army, with character reported as at least good, and who, having been found physically qualified for the duties of a soldier, is not over 50 years of age, shall reenlist in said Army, under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe, shall receive on so reenlisting a payment for having kept himself fit for service, which shall be computed at the rate of $20 for each year that shall have elapsed since his last final discharge from the Regular Army and the date of his reenlistment therein under the terms of said call; but no such payment in excess of $200 shall be paid to any person under the terms of this section.

SEC. 37. Preference in the civil service: All enlisted men who have completed six years' service in the Regular Army with the colors, and who desire to enter the civil service, may be examined, under such regulations as the President may prescribe, by boards of not less than three commissioned officers, to be appointed by their respective commanding officers, and said boards shall certify as to the character of employment for which each applicant is recommended, and upon such recommendation and without further examination under civil-service rules, certified applicants shall be appointed to any vacancies existing or occurring within or under the jurisdiction of the War Department or the Secretary of War that may not be filled by promotion within the service in which the vacancy exists. In event of there being no vacancies under the War Department, the President may, in his discretion, direct the appointment of such certified enlisted applicants to vacancies under any other department of the classes for which recommended: Provided, That such civil employment shall not terminate any existing obligation as to service in the Regular Army reserve.

SEC. 38. Sergeants for duty with the National Guard: For the purpose of assisting in the instruction of the personnel and care of property in the hands of the National Guard the Secretary of War is authorized to detail from the Infantry, Cavalry, Field Artillery, Corps of Engineers, Coast Artillery Corps, Medical Corps, and Signal Corps of the Regular Army not to exceed 1,000 sergeants for duty with corresponding organizations of the National Guard and not to exceed 100 sergeants for duty with the disciplinary organizations at the United States disciplinary barracks, who shall be additional to the sergeants authorized by this act for the corps, companies, troops, batteries, and detachments from which they may be detailed.

SEC. 39. The Officers' Reserve Corps: For the purpose of securing a reserve of officers available for service as temporary officers in the Regular Army as provided for in this act and in section 8 of the act approved April 25, 1914, as officers for recruit rendezvous and depots, and as officers of volunteers, there shall be organized, under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe, not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, an Officers' Reserve Corps of the Army of the United States. Except as otherwise herein provided, a member of the Officers' Reserve Corps shall be subject to call for service only in event of actual or threatened war, and whenever called upon for service shall not, without his consent, be so called in a lower grade than that held by him in said reserve corps.

The President of the United States is authorized to appoint and commission, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, reserve officers in all grades up to and including the grade of major, from citizens of the United States who, upon examination prescribed by the Secretary of War, are found physically, professionally, and morally qualified to hold such commission, the persons so commissioned to constitute and be known as the reserve corps of the several arms, corps, or departments in which commissioned by the President: Provided, That the proportion of reserve officers in any arm, corps, or department of the Officers' Reserve Corps shall not exceed the proportion for the same grade in the same arm, corps, or department of the Regular Army, except that the number commissioned in the lowest authorized grade in any arm, corps, or department of the officers' reserve corps shall not be limited.

All persons now carried as duly qualified and registered, pursuant to section 23 of the act of Congress approved January 21, 1903, and all officers of the Medical Reserve Corps shall, for a period of three years after the passage of this act, be eligible for appointment in the Officers' Reserve Corps in the arm, corps, or department for which they shall have been found qualified without further examination, except the physical examination, subject to the limitations as to rank herein prescribed.

Commissions duly issued by the President to officers of the Officers' Reserve Corps shall be in force for a period of five years unless terminated in the discretion of the President; such officers may be recommissioned either in the same or higher grade for consecutive periods of five years, subject to such examinations and qualifications as the President may prescribe: Provided, That officers of the officers' reserve corps shall have rank therein in the various arms, corps, and departments of said reserve corps according to grades and to length of service in their respective grades, and when employed in active service shall take rank next after all officers of the same grades in the Regular Army.

SEC. 40. The Officers' Reserve Corps in war: In time of actual or threatened war the Secretary of War may order officers of the Officers' Reserve Corps, subject to such subsequent physical examinations as he may prescribe, to temporary duty with the Regular Army in grades thereof which can not, for the time being, be filled by promotion, as officers in volunteer organizations, and officers of recruit rendezvous and depots, in such numbers as may be authorized by law. While such reserve officers are on such service they shall be entitled to the pay and allowances of the corresponding grades in the Regular Army, with increase of pay for length of service as now allowed by law for officers in the Regular Army, their active service alone being considered, from the date upon which they are required by the terms of their order to obey the same.

SEC. 41. Instruction of officers of the Officers' Reserve Corps: To the extent provided for from time to time by appropriations the Secretary of War is authorized to order reserve officers to duty with troops or at field exercises, for periods not to exceed two weeks in any one calendar year, and while so serving such officer shall receive the pay and allowances of their grade: Provided, That with the consent of such officers the Secretary of War is authorized to prolong this period or to order them for duty on boards, or for consultation or advice, or for other temporary duty, to the extent justified by the amount appropriated and the public needs: Provided further, That in time of actual or threatened hostilities after all officers of the Officers' Reserve Corps of any arm, corps, or department have been ordered into active service, officers of Volunteers may be appointed in such arm, corps, or department in such numbers and grades as may be necessary: And provided further, That nothing herein shall operate to prevent the appointment of any officer of the Regular Army as an officer of Volunteers before all the officers of the Officers' Reserve Corps have been ordered into active service: And provided further, That in determining the relative rank and the right to retirement of an officer of the Regular Army, active duty performed by him under the provisions of this section while serving in the Officers' Reserve Corps shall not be reckoned.

SEC. 42. The Reserve Officers' Training Corps: The President is hereby authorized to establish and maintain in civil educational institutions a Reserve Officers' Training Corps, which shall consist of a senior division organized at universities and colleges requiring four years of collegiate study for a degree, including those State institutions that are required to provide instruction in military tactics under the provisions of the act of Congress of July 2, 1862, donating lands for the establishment of colleges where the object shall be practical instruction in agriculture and the mechanic arts, including military tactics, and a junior division organized at all other public or private educational institutions, and each division shall consist of units of the several arms or corps in such number and of such strength as the President may prescribe.

SEC. 43. The President may, upon the application of any State institution described in section 42 of this act, establish and maintain at such institution one or more units of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps: Provided, That no such unit shall be established or maintained at any such institution at which an officer of the Army is not detailed as professor of military science and tactics or at any such institution which does not maintain under military instruction at least 100 physically fit male students.

SEC. 44. The President may, upon the application of any established educational institution in the United States other than a State institution described in section 42 of this act, the authorities of which agree to establish and maintain a two years' elective or compulsory course of military training as a minimum for its physically fit male students, which course when entered upon by any student shall, as regards such student, be a prerequisite for graduation, establish and maintain at such institution one or more units of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps: Provided, That no such unit shall be established or maintained at any such institution at which an officer of the Army is not detailed as professor of military science and tactics, or at any such institution which does not maintain under military instruction at least 100 physically fit male students.

SEC. 45. The Secretary of War is hereby authorized to prescribe standard courses of theoretical and practical military training for units of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and no unit of the senior division shall be organized or maintained at any educational institution the authorities of which fail or neglect to adopt into their curriculum the prescribed courses of military training for the senior division or to devote at least an average of five hours per week per academic year to such military training; and no unit of the junior division shall be organized or maintained at any educational institution the authorities of which fail or neglect to adopt into their curriculum the prescribed courses of military training for the junior division, or to devote at least an average of three hours per week per academic year to such military training.

SEC. 46. Eligibility to membership in the Reserve Officers' Training Corps shall be limited to students of institutions in which units of such corps may be established who are citizens of the United States, who are over 13 years of age, and whose bodily condition indicates that they are physically fit to perform military duty or will be so upon arrival at military age.

SEC. 47. The President is hereby authorized to detail such numbers of officers of the Army, either active or retired, not above the grade of colonel, as may be necessary, for duty as professors and assistant professors of military science and tactics at institutions where one or more units of the reserve officers' training corps are maintained; but the total number of active officers so detailed at educational institutions shall not exceed 300, and no active officer shall be so detailed who has not had five years' commissioned service in the Army. In time of peace retired officers shall not be detailed under the provisions of this section without their consent. Retired officers below the grade of lieutenant colonel so detailed shall receive the full pay and allowances of their grade, and retired officers above the grade of major so detailed shall receive the same pay and allowances as a retired major would receive under a like detail. No detail under the provisions of this section shall extend for more than four years.

SEC. 48. The President is hereby authorized to detail for duty at institutions where one or more units of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps are maintained such number of enlisted men, either active or retired or of the Regular Army Reserve, as he may deem necessary, but the number of active noncommissioned officers so detailed shall not exceed 500, and all active noncommissioned officers so detailed shall be additional in their respective grades to those otherwise authorized for the Army. Retired enlisted men or members of the Regular Army Reserve shall not be detailed under the provisions of this section without their consent. While so detailed they shall receive active pay and allowances.

SEC. 49. The Secretary of War, under such regulations as he may prescribe, is hereby authorized to issue to institutions at which one or more units of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps are maintained such public animals, arms, uniforms, equipment, and means of transportation as he may deem necessary, and to forage at the expense of the United States public animals so issued. He shall require from each institution to which property of the United States is issued a bond in the value of the property issued for the care and safe-keeping thereof, and for its return when required.

SEC. 50. Student camps: The Secretary of War is hereby authorized to maintain camps for the further practical instruction of the members of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, no such camps to be maintained for a period longer than six weeks, except in time of actual or threatened war; to transport members of such corps to and from such camps at the expense of the United States so far as appropriations will permit; to subsist them at the expense of the United States while traveling to and from such camps and while remaining therein so far as appropriations will permit; to use the Regular Army and such Government property as he may deem necessary for the military training of the members of such corps while in attendance at such camps; to prescribe regulations for the government of such corps; and to authorize, in his discretion, the formation of company units thereof into battalion and regimental units.

SEC. 51. The President alone, under such regulations as he may prescribe, is hereby authorized to appoint as a reserve officer any graduate of the senior division of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, or any graduate of the junior division who shall have satisfactorily completed the courses of military training prescribed for the senior division and participated in such practical instruction subsequent to graduation as the Secretary of War shall prescribe, and who shall have arrived at the age of 21 years and who shall agree, under oath in writing, to serve the United States in the capacity of a reserve officer of the Army during a period of at least 10 years from the date of his appointment as such reserve officer, unless sooner discharged by proper authority; but the total number of reserve officers so appointed shall not exceed 50,000: Provided, That any graduate of the senior division of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps undergoing a postgraduate course at any institution shall not be eligible for appointment as a reserve officer while undergoing such postgraduate course, but his ultimate eligibility upon completion of such postgraduate course for such appointment shall not be affected because of his having undergone such postgraduate course.

SEC. 52. When any member of the senior division of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps has completed two academic years of service in that division, and has been selected for further training by the president of the institution and by its professor of military science and tactics, and has agreed in writing to continue in the Reserve Officers' Training Corps for the remainder of his course in the institution, including such camp training as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of War, he may be furnished, at the expense of the United States, with commutation of subsistence at such rate, not exceeding the cost of the garrison ration prescribed for the Army, as may be fixed by the Secretary of War, during the remainder of his service in the Reserve Officers' Training Corps.

SEC. 53. Any physically fit male citizen of the United States, between the ages of 21 and 27 years, who shall have graduated prior to the date of this act from any educational institution at which an officer of the Army was detailed as professor of military science and tactics, and who while a student at such institution completed courses of military training under the direction of such professor of military science and tactics substantially equivalent to those prescribed pursuant to this act for the senior division, shall, after satisfactorily completing such additional practical military training as the Secretary of War shall prescribe, be eligible for appointment as a reserve officer and as a temporary additional second lieutenant in accordance with the terms of this act.

SEC. 54. The President alone is hereby authorized to appoint and commission as a temporary second lieutenant of the Regular Army in time of peace for purposes of instruction, for a period not exceeding six months, with the allowances now provided by law for that grade, but with pay at the rate of $100 per month, any reserve officer appointed pursuant to sections 51 and 53 of this act and to attach him to a unit of the Regular Army for duty and training during the period covered by his appointment as such temporary second lieutenant, and upon the expiration of such service with the Regular Army such officer shall revert to his status as a reserve officer.

SEC. 55. No reserve officer or temporary second lieutenant appointed pursuant to this act shall be entitled to retirement or to retired pay and shall be eligible for pension only for disability incurred in line of duty in active service or while serving with the Regular Army pursuant to the provisions of this act.

SEC. 56. The Volunteer Army: The President is hereby authorized, at any time, to organize, maintain, and train, under the provisions of sections 3 to 12, both inclusive, of an act entitled "An act to provide for raising the volunteer forces of the United States in time of actual or threatened war," approved April 25, 1914, volunteer forces, not exceeding an average of 600 officers and enlisted men for each congressional district. The term of enlistment, which shall in no event be greater than that of the Regular Army, the period of service with the colors and with the reserve, and the period of training shall be as the President may prescribe, those passing to the reserve to have the status and obligations prescribed for reserves of the Regular Army. Officers and enlisted men of the volunteer forces raised under the provisions of this section shall be entitled to the pay and allowances of officers and enlisted men of corresponding grades in the Regular Army during periods of training only.

Temporary appointments and promotions of officers of the Regular Army arising from the operation of this section may be terminated at the discretion of the President.

Officers of the Regular Army who receive commissions in the Volunteer Army herein authorized shall in time of peace receive the pay and allowances of their respective grades in the Regular Army, and no more.

SEC. 57. Composition of the militia: The militia of the United States shall consist of all able-bodied male citizens of the United States and all other able-bodied males who have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States who are more than 16 years of age and not more than 45 years of age, and shall be divided into two classes, the National Guard and the Unorganized Militia.

SEC. 58. Composition of the National Guard: The National Guard shall consist of the regularly enlisted militia between the ages of 16 and 45 years, organized, armed, and equipped as hereinafter provided, and of commissioned officers between the ages of 21 and 64 years.

All other militia shall be known as the Unorganized Militia.

SEC. 59. The Vice President of the United States, the officers, judicial and executive, of the Government of the United States; persons in the military or naval service of the United States; customhouse clerks; persons employed by the United States in the transmission of the mail; artificers and workmen employed in the armories, arsenals, and navy yards of the United States; pilots; mariners actually employed in the sea service of any citizen or merchant within the United States shall be exempt from militia duty without regard to age, and all persons who because of religious beliefs claim exemption from military service shall be eligible for such noncombatant service as the President may prescribe.

SEC. 60. Organization of National Guard units: The organization, armament, equipment, discipline, and training of the National Guard shall be the same as that which is or may hereafter be prescribed for the Regular Army, subject in time of peace to such general exceptions as may be authorized by the Secretary of War, and the President may prescribe the particular unit or units as to branch or arm of the service to be maintained in each State, Territory, or District in order to secure a force which when combined shall form complete higher tactical units.

SEC. 61. The organization of all units of the National Guard, including their staffs and headquarters, shall be the same as corresponding units of the Regular Army: Provided, That the President shall, in time of peace, prescribe a maximum and a minimum strength for each unit.

SEC. 62. Number of the National Guard: The number of the National Guard to be organized under this bill within one year shall be for each State in the proportion of 200 for each Senator and Representative in Congress from such State, and a number to be determined by the President for Territories and the District of Columbia, and may be increased each year thereafter in the proportion of 50 per cent until a total peace strength averaging 500 for each Senator and Representative in Congress has been reached: Provided, That this shall not be construed to prevent any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia from organizing the full number of troops required under this section in less time, or from maintaining existing organizations if they conform to such rules and regulations regarding organization, strength, and armament as the President may prescribe: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent any State with but one Representative in Congress from organizing a maximum of one regiment of troops, with such auxiliary troops as the President may prescribe; such organizations and members of such organizations to receive all the benefits accruing under this act under the conditions set forth herein: And provided further, That the word Territory as used in this act and in all laws relating to the militia and National Guard shall include Porto Rico and the Canal Zone.

SEC. 63. Any corps of Artillery, Cavalry, or Infantry existing in any of the States on the passage of the act of May 8, 1792, which by the laws, customs, or usages of said States has been in continuous existence since the passage of said act, under its provisions and under the provisions of section 232 and sections 1625 to 1660, both inclusive, of title 16 of the Revised Statutes of 1873, and the act of January 21, 1903, relating to the militia, shall be allowed to retain its ancient privileges, subject, nevertheless, to all duties required by law of militia: Provided, That said organizations may be a part of the National Guard and entitled to all the privileges of this act, and shall conform in all respects to the organization, discipline, and training of the National Guard in time of war: Provided further, That for purposes of training and when on active duty in the service of the United States they may be assigned to higher units, as the President may direct, and shall be subject to the orders of officers under whom they are serving.

SEC. 64. Assignment of National Guard to brigades and divisions: For the purpose of maintaining appropriate organization and to assist in instruction and training, the President may assign the National Guard of the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia to divisions, brigades, and other tactical units, and may detail officers of appropriate grade either from the National Guard or the Regular Army to command such units: Provided, That where complete units are organized within a State, Territory, or the District of Columbia the commanding officers thereof shall not be displaced.

SEC. 65. The President may detail one officer of the Regular Army as chief of staff and two officers of the Regular Army or the National Guard as assistants to the chief of staff of any division of the National Guard called into the service of the United States: Provided, That in order to insure the prompt mobilization of the National Guard in time of war or other emergency, the President may, in time of peace, detail an officer of the Regular Army to perform the duties of chief of staff for each tactical division of the National Guard.

SEC. 66. Adjutants general of States, etc.: The adjutants general of the States, Territories, and the District of Columbia and the officers of the National Guard shall make such returns and reports to the Secretary of War at such times and in such form as the latter may from time to time prescribe: Provided, That the adjutants general of the Territories and of the District of Columbia shall be appointed by the President with such rank and qualifications as he may prescribe.

SEC. 67. Disbursing officers of States, etc.: The governor of each State and Territory and the commanding general of the Militia of the District of Columbia may appoint, designate, or detail, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, the adjutant general or an officer of the National Guard of the State, Territory, or District of Columbia who shall be regarded as property and disbursing officer for the United States. He shall receipt and annually account for all property belonging to the United States in possession of the National Guard of his State, Territory, or District, and shall make such returns and reports concerning the same as may be required by the Secretary of War. The Secretary of War is authorized, on the requisition of the governor of a State or Territory or the commanding general of the National Guard of the District of Columbia, to pay to the property and disbursing officer thereof so much of its allotment out of the annual appropriation under section 1661 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, as shall be necessary for the purposes enumerated therein. He shall render, through the War Department, such accounts of Federal funds intrusted to him for disbursement as may be required by the Treasury Department. Before entering upon the performance of his duties as property and disbursing officer he shall be required to give good and sufficient bond to the United States, the amount thereof to be determined by the Secretary of War, for the faithful performance of his duties and for the safekeeping and proper disposition of the Federal property and funds intrusted to his care. He shall, after having qualified as property and disbursing officer, receive pay for his services from funds allotted to the State, Territory, and the District of Columbia in accordance with the numbers of officers and men of the National Guard of said State, Territory, or the District of Columbia who are actually enrolled and regularly receiving military instruction and training, as follows: Five hundred dollars for not less than 500 officers and men and not more than 1,500 officers and men; $700 for more than 1,500 officers and men and not more than 2,500 officers and men; $1,000 for more than 2,500 officers and men and not more than 3,500 officers and men; $1,250 for more than 3,500 officers and men and not more than 4,500 officers and men; $1,500 for more than 4,500 officers and men and not more than 5,500 officers and men; $1,750 for more than 5,500 officers and men and not more than 7,500 officers and men; $2,000 for more than 7,500 officers and men and not more than 8,500 officers and men; $2,500 for more than 8,500 officers and men: Provided, That when traveling in the performance of his official duties under orders issued by the proper authorities he shall be reimbursed for his actual necessary traveling expenses, the sum to be made a charge against the allotment of the State, Territory, or District of Columbia: Provided further, That the Secretary of War shall cause an inspection of the accounts and records of the property and disbursing officer to be made by an officer of the Army at least once each year: And provided further, That the Secretary of War is empowered to make all rules and regulations necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this section.

SEC. 68. Location of units: The location of the units and headquarters of the National Guard within the States and Territories shall be fixed by the authorities thereof: Provided, That no part of the National Guard which is entitled to compensation under the provisions of this act shall be disbanded without the consent of the President.

SEC. 69. Enlistments in the National Guard: Hereafter the period of enlistment in the National Guard shall be for six years, the first three years of which shall be in an active organization and the remaining three years in the National Guard reserve, hereinafter provided for, and the qualifications for enlistment shall be the same as those prescribed for admission to the Regular Army.

SEC. 70. Enlisted men in the Organized Militia of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia now serving under enlistment contracts which contain an obligation to defend the Constitution of the United States and to obey the orders of the President of the United States shall be recognized as members of the National Guard under the provisions of this act for the unexpired portion of their present enlistment contract. When the enlistment contract does not contain such an obligation, no enlisted man shall be recognized as a member of the National Guard until he shall have signed an enlistment contract containing the new obligation, upon signing which credit shall be given for the period already served under the old enlistment contract.

SEC. 71. Federal enlistment contract: The provisions of this act as to the National Guard shall not apply to enlisted men thereof who have not signed an additional contract, which shall include an obligation to bear true faith and allegiance to the United States and support the Constitution thereof and obey the orders of the President of the United States and the officers appointed over them, and which shall also contain the following agreement: "In the event that the President of the United States shall order the National Guard into active service because of actual or threatened war within three years from the date of my enlistment I agree to serve as a member of the National Guard in the service of the United States within or without the continental limits of the United States for the period of three years from the date of said order or until discharged by order of the President of the United States."

SEC. 72. Discharge of enlisted men from the National Guard: An enlisted man discharged from service shall receive a discharge in writing in such form and with such classification as is prescribed for the Regular Army, and in time of peace discharges may be given prior to the expiration of terms of enlistment under such regulations as the President may prescribe.

SEC. 73. Federal oath for officers of National Guard: The provisions of this act as to the National Guard shall apply to officers thereof now serving under their present commissions: Provided, That they have taken, or may hereafter take, an oath to bear true faith and allegiance to the United States, to support the Constitution of the United States, and obey the orders of the President of the United States: Provided further, That no person hereafter commissioned shall be recognized as an officer of the National Guard under the provisions of this act until he has accepted such commission and taken the prescribed oath, which shall contain the same agreement as to service prescribed for enlisted men.

SEC. 74. Hereafter commissioned officers of the National Guard shall not be recognized as such under the provisions of this act unless they shall have been selected from the following classes: Officers or enlisted men of the National Guard; officers on the reserve or unassigned list of the National Guard; officers, active or retired, and ex-officers of the United States Army, Navy, and Marine Corps; graduates of the United States Military and Naval Academies and graduates of schools, colleges, and universities where military science is taught under the supervision of an officer of the Regular Army, and for the technical branches and staff corps or departments such other civilians as may be specially qualified for duty therein.

SEC. 75. Qualifications for National Guard officers: The provisions of this act shall not apply to any person who has been appointed an officer of the National Guard unless he first shall have successfully passed such tests as to physical, moral, and professional fitness as may be prescribed by the President. The examination to determine the qualifications for commission shall be conducted by a board of three commissioned officers appointed by the Secretary of War from officers of the Regular Army or of the National Guard, or of both.

SEC. 76. Filling of vacancies when in Federal service: All vacancies which exist or occur in the grade of second lieutenant of any portion of the National Guard in the active service of the United States shall be filled by the President from the enlisted men of the National Guard of the State, Territory, or District in which the vacancy occurs. All other appointments and promotions below the grade of lieutenant colonel shall, under the circumstances, be made by the President alone, and all appointments and promotions to the grade of lieutenant colonel and higher grades shall be made by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

SEC. 77. Elimination board: At any time the moral character, capacity, and general fitness for the service of any National Guard officer may be determined by an efficiency board of three commissioned officers, senior in rank to the officer whose fitness for service is being investigated, and if the findings of such board be unfavorable to such officer and be approved by the official authorized to appoint such an officer he shall be discharged.

SEC. 78. Vacation of commissions: Commissions of officers of the National Guard may be vacated upon resignation, absence without leave for three months, upon the recommendation of an efficiency board, or pursuant to sentence of a court-martial.

SEC. 79. Disposition of surplus officers: Officers of the National Guard rendered surplus by the disbandment of their organizations may be placed in the Officers' Reserve Corps. Officers may, upon their own application, be placed in the Officers' Reserve Corps.

SEC. 80. The National Guard reserve: Subject to such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe, a National Guard reserve shall be organized in each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia, to consist of honorably discharged enlisted men of the National Guard of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia: Provided, That reservists when engaged in field or coast-defense training with the active militia shall receive the same pay and allowances as enlisted men of like grade on the active list of the National Guard, and when called into active service shall be incorporated into the National Guard and be subject to the same laws, orders, and regulations which govern the same.

SEC. 81. Armament, equipment, and uniform of the National Guard: The National Guard of the United States shall, as far as practicable, be uniformed, armed, and equipped with the same type of uniforms, arms, and equipments provided for the Regular Army.

SEC. 82. Under such regulations as the President may prescribe, the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to procure, within the limits of appropriations made by Congress for the purpose, by purchase or manufacture, and to issue from time to time to the National Guard, upon requisition of the governors of the several States and Territories or the commanding general of the Militia of the District of Columbia, such number of United States service arms, with all accessories; field-artillery material, engineer, signal, and sanitary material, accouterments, field uniforms, clothing, equipage, publications, and military stores of all kinds, including public animals, as are necessary to arm, uniform, and equip for field service the National Guard in the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia: Provided, That as a condition precedent to the issue of any property as provided for by this act, the State, Territory, or the District of Columbia shall make adequate provision for the protection and care of such property.

SEC. 83. Under such regulations as the President may prescribe, whenever a new type of equipment, small arm, or field gun shall have been issued to the National Guard of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, such equipment, small arms, and field guns, including all accessories, shall be furnished without charging the cost or value thereof or any expense connected therewith against the appropriations provided in this act.

SEC. 84. Each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia shall, on the receipt of new property issued to replace obsolete or condemned prior issues, turn in to the department or otherwise dispose of, in accordance with the directions of the Secretary of War, all property so replaced or condemned without receiving any money credit therefor.

SEC. 85. Any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia may, with the approval of the Secretary of War, purchase for cash from the War Department for the use of the National Guard, including the officers thereof, such stores, supplies, material of war, and military publications as are furnished to the Army, in addition to those issued under the provisions of this act, at the price at which they are listed to the Army, with cost of transportation added. The funds received from such sale shall be credited to the appropriation to which they belong, and shall not be covered into the Treasury, and shall be available until expended to replace therewith the supplies sold to the States in the manner herein authorized: Provided, That stores, supplies, and material of war so purchased by a State, Territory, or the District of Columbia may, in time of actual or threatened war, be requisitioned by the United States for use in the military service thereof and when so requisitioned by the United States and delivered, credit for the ultimate return of such property in kind shall be allowed to such State, Territory, or the District of Columbia.

SEC. 86. Disposition and replacement of damaged property, etc.: All military property issued to the National Guard as herein provided shall remain the property of the United States. Whenever any such property issued to the National Guard in any State or Territory or the District of Columbia has been lost, damaged, or destroyed, or has become unserviceable or unsuitable by use in service or from any other cause, it shall be examined by a disinterested surveying officer of the Regular Army or the National Guard detailed by the Secretary of War and the report of such surveying officer shall be forwarded to the Secretary of War, and if it shall appear to the Secretary of War from the record of survey that the property has been lost, damaged, or destroyed through unavoidable causes, he is hereby authorized to relieve the State or Territory or the District of Columbia from further accountability therefor; if it shall appear that the loss, damage, or destruction of property was due to carelessness or neglect, or that its loss, damage, or destruction could have been avoided by the exercise of reasonable care, the money value thereof shall be charged to the State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, to be paid for from State, Territory, or District funds, or any funds other than Federal. If the articles so surveyed are found to be unserviceable or unsuitable, the Secretary of War shall direct what disposition, by sale or otherwise, shall be made of them; and if sold, the proceeds of such sale, as well as stoppages against officers and enlisted men, and the net proceeds of collections made from any person or from any State, Territory, or District to reimburse the Government for the loss, damage, or destruction of any property shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States as a credit to said State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, accountable for said property, and as a part of and in addition to that portion of its allotment set aside for the purchase of similar supplies, stores, or material of war: Provided further, That if any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia neglects or refuses to pay, or to cause to be paid, the money equivalent of any loss, damage, or destruction of property charged against such State, Territory, or the District of Columbia by the Secretary of War after survey by a disinterested officer appointed as hereinbefore provided, the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to debar such State, Territory, or the District of Columbia from further participation in any and all appropriations for the National Guard until such payment is made.

SEC. 87. The net proceeds of the sale of condemned stores issued to the National Guard and not charged to State allotments shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States, as shall also stoppages against officers and enlisted men, and the net proceeds of collections made from any person to reimburse the Government for the loss, damage, or destruction of said property not charged against the State allotment issued for the use of the National Guard.

SEC. 88. Horses for Cavalry and Field Artillery of National Guard: Appropriations made for the particular purpose shall be available for the purchase, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, of horses conforming to the Regular Army standards for the use of Field Artillery and Cavalry of the National Guard, said horses to remain the property of the United States and to be used solely for military purposes.

Horses so purchased may be issued not to exceed 32 to any one battery or troop, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe; and the Secretary of War is further authorized to issue, in lieu of purchase, for the use of such organizations, condemned Army horses which are no longer fit for service, but which may be suitable for the purposes of instruction, the same to be sold as now provided by law when the latter purpose has been served.

SEC. 89. Appropriations made for the particular purpose shall be available for the purchase and issue of forage, bedding, shoeing, and veterinary services, and supplies for the Government horses issued to any battery or troop, and for the compensation of competent help for the care of the material, animals, and equipment thereof, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe: Provided, That the men to be compensated, not to exceed five for each battery or troop, shall be duly enlisted therein and shall be detailed by the battery or troop commander, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, and shall be paid by the United States disbursing officer in each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia.

SEC. 90. Discipline to conform to that of Regular Army: The discipline, which includes training, of the National Guard shall conform to the system which is now or may hereafter be prescribed for the Regular Army, and the training shall be carried out by the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia so as to conform to the provisions of this act.

SEC. 91. Training of the National Guard: Each company, troop, battery, and detachment in the National Guard shall assemble for drill and instruction, including indoor target practice, not less than 48 times each year, and shall, in addition thereto, participate in encampments, maneuvers, or other exercises, including outdoor target practice, at least 24 days each year, 5 of which shall be in rifle practice, unless such company, troop, battery, or detachment shall have been excused from participation in any part thereof by the Secretary of War: Provided, That credit for an assembly for drill or for indoor target practice shall not be given unless the number of officers and enlisted men present for duty at such assembly shall equal or exceed a minimum to be prescribed by the President, nor unless the period of actual military duty and instruction participated in by each officer and enlisted man at each such assembly at which he is credited as having been present shall be of at least one and one-half hours' duration and the character of training such as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 92. Inspections of the National Guard: The Secretary of War shall cause an inspection to be made at least once each year by officers of the Regular Army detailed by him for that purpose to determine whether the amount and condition of the property in the hands of the National Guard is satisfactory; whether the National Guard is organized as hereinbefore prescribed; whether the officers and enlisted men possess the physical and other qualifications prescribed; whether the organization and the officers and enlisted men thereof are sufficiently armed, uniformed, equipped, and being trained and instructed for active duty in the field or coast defense, and whether the records are being kept in accordance with the requirements of this act. The reports of such inspections shall serve as the basis for determining what organizations and individuals shall be considered as constituting the National Guard within the meaning of this act.

SEC. 93. Encampments and maneuvers: Under such regulations as the President may prescribe the Secretary of War is authorized to provide for the participation of any part of the National Guard in encampments, maneuvers, or other exercises, including outdoor target practice, for field or coast-defense instruction, either independently or in conjunction with any part of the Regular Army, and there may be set aside from the funds appropriated for that purpose and allotted to any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia such portion of said funds as may be necessary for the payment, subsistence, transportation, and other expenses of that portion of the National Guard in the State, Territory, or the District of Columbia which may participate in such encampments, maneuvers, or other exercises, including outdoor target practice, for field and coast-defense instruction; and the officers and enlisted men of such National Guard while so engaged shall be entitled to the same pay, subsistence, and transportation as officers and enlisted men of corresponding grades of the Regular Army are or hereafter may be entitled by law.

SEC. 94. When any part of the National Guard participates in encampments, maneuvers, or other exercises, including outdoor target practice, for field or coast-defense instruction at a United States military post, reservation, or elsewhere the command of the military post or reservation where such encampments or maneuvers are held, and of the officers and troops of the United States there on duty, shall remain with the commander of the United States troops without regard to the rank of the commanding or other officer of the National Guard temporarily engaged in the encampments or maneuvers for field or coast-defense instruction.

SEC. 95. Use of Regular Army personnel: The Secretary of War may detail one or more officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army to attend any encampment, maneuver, or other exercise for field or coast-defense instruction of the National Guard, who shall give such instruction and information to the officers and men assembled for such encampment, maneuver, or other exercise as may be directed by the Secretary of War or requested by the governor or by the commanding officer of the National Guard there on duty.

SEC. 96. Under such regulations as the President may prescribe the Secretary of War may provide camps for the instruction of officers and enlisted men of the National Guard. Such camps shall be conducted by officers of the Regular Army detailed by the Secretary of War for that purpose, and may be located either within or without the State, Territory, or District of Columbia to which the members of the National Guard so designated to attend belong. Officers and enlisted men attending such camps shall be entitled to pay and transportation, and enlisted men to subsistence in addition, at the same rates as for encampments or maneuvers for field or coast-defense instruction.

SEC. 97. When any portion of the National Guard participates in encampments, maneuvers, or other exercises, including outdoor target practice, for field or coast-defense instruction under the provisions of this act they may, after being duly mustered, be paid at any time after such muster for the period from the date of leaving the home rendezvous to date of return thereto as determined in advance, both dates inclusive; and such payment, if otherwise correct, shall pass to the credit of the disbursing officer making the same.

SEC. 98. National Guard officers and men at service schools: Under such regulations as the President may prescribe, the Secretary of War may, upon the recommendation of the governor of any State or Territory or the commanding general of the Militia of the District of Columbia, authorize a limited number of selected officers or enlisted men of the National Guard to attend and pursue a regular course of study at any military service school of the United States, except the United States Military Academy; or to be attached to an organization of the same arm, corps, or department to which the officer or enlisted man belongs for routine practical instruction at or near an Army post during its period of field training or outdoor season; and such officer or enlisted man shall receive the same travel allowances and quarters, or commutation of quarters, and the same pay, allowances, and subsistence to which an officer or enlisted man of the Regular Army would be entitled for attending such school, college, or practical course of instruction under orders from proper military authority, while in actual attendance at such school, college, or practical course of instruction: Provided, That in no case shall the pay and allowances herein authorized exceed those of a captain.

SEC. 99. Detail of officers of Regular Army to duty with National Guard: Upon the request of the governor of any State, Territory, or the commanding general of the Militia of the District of Columbia, the President may detail officers of the active list of the Army to duty with the National Guard in such State, Territory, or District of Columbia, and officers so detailed may accept commissions in the National Guard with the permission of the President and terminable in his discretion without vacating their commissions in the Regular Army, or being prejudiced in their relative or lineal standing therein. The Secretary of War may, upon like application, detail one or more enlisted men of the Regular Army with such State, Territory, or District of Columbia for duty in connection with the National Guard. But nothing in this section shall be so construed as to prevent the detail of retired officers as now provided by law.

SEC. 100. Militia, when subject to laws governing Regular Army: The militia, when called into the service of the United States, shall from the time they are required by the terms of the call to respond thereto be subject to the laws and regulations governing the Regular Army, so far as such laws and regulations are applicable to officers and enlisted men whose permanent retention in the military service, either on the active list or on the retired list, is not contemplated by existing law.

SEC. 101. System of courts-martial for National Guard: Except when called into the service of the United States, courts-martial in the National Guard of the United States shall be of three kinds, namely, general courts-martial, special courts-martial, and summary courts-martial. They shall be constituted and have cognizance of the same subjects and possess like powers, except as to punishments, as similar courts provided for by the laws and regulations governing the Army of the United States, and the proceedings of courts-martial of the National Guard shall follow the forms and modes of procedure prescribed for such courts.

SEC. 102. General courts-martial may be convened by order of the governors of the respective States and Territories and by the commanding general of the Militia of the District of Columbia, and such courts shall have the power to impose fines not exceeding $200; to sentence to forfeiture of pay and allowances; to a reprimand; to dismissal or dishonorable discharge from the service; to reduce noncommissioned officers to the ranks; or any two or more of such punishments may be combined in the sentences imposed by such courts.

SEC. 103. The commanding officer of each garrison, fort, post, camp, or other place, brigade, regiment, detached battalion, or other detached command of the National Guard, may appoint special courts-martial for his command; but such special courts-martial may in any case be appointed by superior authority when by the latter deemed desirable. Special courts-martial shall have power to try any person subject to military law, except an officer, for any crime or offense made punishable by the military laws of the United States, and such special courts-martial shall have the same powers of punishment as do general courts-martial, except that fines imposed by such courts shall not exceed $100.

SEC. 104. The commanding officer of each garrison, fort, post, or other place, regiment or corps, detached battalion, company, or other detachment of the National Guard may appoint for such place or command a summary court to consist of one officer, who shall have power to administer oaths and to try the enlisted men of such place or command for breaches of discipline and violations of laws governing such organizations; and said court, when satisfied of the guilt of such soldier, may impose fines not exceeding $25 for any single offense; may sentence noncommissioned officers to reduction to the ranks; may sentence to forfeiture of pay and allowances. The proceedings of such court shall be informal, and the minutes thereof shall be the same as prescribed for summary courts of the Army of the United States.

SEC. 105. All courts-martial of the National Guard, including summary courts, shall have power to sentence to confinement in lieu of fines authorized to be imposed: Provided, That such sentences of confinement shall not exceed one day for each dollar of fine authorized.

SEC. 106. No sentence of dismissal from the service or dishonorable discharge shall, except when in the service of the United States, be executed until approved by the governor of a State or Territory or the commanding general of the Militia of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 107. Presidents of courts-martial and summary court officers of the National Guard shall have power to issue warrants to arrest accused persons and to bring them before the court for trial whenever such persons have disobeyed an order in writing from the convening authority to appear before such court, a copy of the charge or charges having been delivered to the accused with such order, and to issue subpœnas and subpœnas duces tecum and to enforce by attachment attendance of witnesses and the production of books and papers, and to sentence for a refusal to be sworn or to answer as provided in actions before civil courts.

All processes and sentences of said courts shall be executed by such civil officers as may be prescribed by the laws of the several States and Territories, and in any State where no provision has been made for such action and in the Territories and the District of Columbia the same shall be executed by a United States marshal or his duly appointed deputy, and it shall be the duty of any United States marshal to execute all such processes and sentences and make return thereof to the officer issuing or imposing the same.

SEC. 108. Pay for National Guard, officers: Commissioned officers on the active list belonging to organizations of the National Guard shall annually receive as reimbursement for their expenses and compensation for their services, except during periods of service for which under existing law they may become entitled to the same pay as officers of corresponding grades of the Regular Army, at the following rates, namely: To captains commanding companies or similar units, $500; to first lieutenants of companies or similar units, $300; to second lieutenants of companies or similar units, $250.

SEC. 109. Pay for National Guard, enlisted men: Each enlisted man on the active list belonging to organizations of the National Guard shall receive as reimbursement for his expenses and compensation for his services, except during periods of service for which under existing law he may become entitled to the same pay as an enlisted man of corresponding grade in the Regular Army, at a rate equal to 25 per cent of the initial pay now or that may be hereafter provided by law for enlisted men of corresponding grades of the Regular Army, but in no event to exceed $120 a year: Provided, That such enlisted man shall receive the compensation herein provided if he shall have attended not less than 48 regular drills of not less than one and one-half hours each during any one year, and a proportionate amount for attendance upon a lesser number of such drills, not less than 24: Provided further, That the compensation provided herein shall be computed for semiannual periods, beginning the 1st day of January and the 1st day of July of each year, in proportion to the number of drills attended; and no compensation shall be paid to any enlisted man for the first semiannual period of any year unless he shall have attended during said period at least 24 drills, but any lesser number of drills attended during said period shall be reckoned with the drills attended during the second semiannual period in computing the compensation, if any, due him for that year: And provided further, That when any man enters into an enlistment he shall be entitled to proportional compensation for that year if during the remainder of the year he shall attend a number of drills whose ratio to 24 is not less than the ratio of the part of the year so served to the whole year; and when any man's enlistment shall expire, the compensation, if any, to which he may be entitled shall be determined in like manner: And provided further, That periods of any actual military duty equivalent to the drills herein prescribed, except those periods of service for which under existing laws members of the National Guard may become entitled to the same pay as officers and enlisted men of the corresponding grades in the Regular Army, may be accepted as service in lieu of such drills when approved by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 110. All amounts appropriated for the purposes of the two preceding sections shall be disbursed and accounted for by the officers and agents of the Quartermaster Corps of the Regular Army, and all disbursements made under the provisions of the two preceding sections shall be made as soon as practicable after the 31st day of December and the 30th day of June of each year upon pay rolls prepared and authenticated in the manner prescribed by the Secretary of War: Provided, That stoppages may be made against the compensation payable to any officer or enlisted man to cover the cost of public property lost or destroyed by and chargeable to such officer or enlisted man.

SEC. 111. No money appropriated under the provisions of this act for the National Guard shall be paid to any person not on the active list of the National Guard, except as provided in section 80 of this act, nor to any person who fails to qualify as to fitness for military service, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe.

SEC. 112. When Congress shall have authorized the use of the armed land forces of the United States requiring the use of troops in excess of those of the Regular Army, the officers and enlisted men of the National Guard, who have signed an enlistment or agreement to render military service to the United States and have received and accepted compensation for training for such service under the provisions of this act, and who have passed the required physical examination at the time of their enlistment, may be ordered into the service of the United States by the President to serve for a period of three years within or without the continental limits of the United States, unless sooner discharged by the President. Officers and enlisted men in the service of the United States, under the terms of this section, shall have the same pay and allowances as officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army.

SEC. 113. Rights to pensions: When any officer or enlisted man of the National Guard is disabled by reason of wounds or disability received or incurred while in the active service of the United States, he shall be entitled to all the benefits of the pension laws existing at the time of his service, and in case such officer or enlisted man dies in the active service of the United States or in returning to his place of residence after being mustered out of such service, or at any other time in consequence of wounds or disabilities received in such active service, his widow and children, if any, shall be entitled to all the benefits of such pension laws.

SEC. 114. Encouragement of rifle practice: The Secretary of War shall annually submit to Congress recommendations and estimates for the establishment and maintenance of indoor and outdoor rifle ranges, under such a comprehensive plan as will ultimately result in providing adequate facilities for rifle practice in all sections of the country, and that all ranges so established and all ranges which may have already been constructed in whole or in part with Federal funds shall be open for use by those in all branches of the military and naval services of the United States and by all able-bodied males capable of bearing arms, under reasonable regulations to be prescribed by the controlling authorities and approved by the Secretary of War. Where rifle ranges have been so established the Secretary of War is authorized to provide for the issue of a reasonable number of standard military rifles and such quantities of ammunition as may be available for use in conducting such rifle practice.

SEC. 115. Temporary vacancies in Regular Army due to details to the National Guard: In time of war the temporary vacancies created in any grade not above that of colonel among the commissioned personnel of any arm, staff corps, or department of the Regular Army through appointments of officers thereof to higher rank in the National Guard under the provisions of this act shall be filled by temporary promotions according to seniority in rank from officers holding commissions in the next lower grade in said arm, staff corps, or department, and all vacancies created in any grade by temporary promotions shall be in like manner filled from and thus create temporary vacancies in the next lower grade, and the vacancies that remain thereafter in said arm, staff corps, or department that can not be filled by temporary promotions as prescribed in this section may be filled by the temporary appointment of officers of such number and grade or grades as shall maintain said arm, corps, or department at the full commissioned strength authorized by law: Provided, That in the staff corps and departments subject to the provisions of sections 26 and 27 of the act of February 2, 1901, and acts amendatory thereof, temporary vacancies that can not be filled by temporary promotions as hereinbefore prescribed shall be filled by temporary details in the manner prescribed in said sections 26 and 27 and acts amendatory thereof, and the resulting temporary vacancies in the branches of the Army from which the details are so made shall be filled as hereinbefore in this section prescribed: Provided further, That officers temporarily promoted or appointed under the terms of this section shall be promoted or appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for terms that shall not extend beyond the war or the passing of the emergency for which additional forces were ordered into active service as a part of the Army of the United States; and at the termination of the war or the passing of the emergency said officers shall be discharged from the positions held by them under their temporary commissions or appointments, and officers detailed as herein authorized shall be relieved from their temporary details: And provided further, That officers temporarily promoted under the provisions of this section shall not vacate their permanent commissions nor be prejudiced in their relative or lineal standing in the Regular Army.

SEC. 116. Muster into the Federal service: Every officer and enlisted man of the National Guard who shall be called into the service of the United States shall be mustered under such regulations as the President may prescribe without further commission or enlistment and without making a physical examination previous to such muster a condition precedent thereto: Provided, That as soon as practicable after such muster there shall be a physical examination of the officers and men so mustered: Provided further, That immediately preceding the muster out of an officer or enlisted man called into the active service of the United States he shall be physically examined under rules prescribed by the President of the United States, and the record thereof shall be filed and kept in the War Department.

SEC. 117. Noncompliance with Federal act: Whenever any State, Territory, or District shall, within a limit of time to be fixed by the President, have failed or refused to comply with or to enforce any requirement of this act relating to the National Guard, or any regulation promulgated thereunder and in aid thereof by the President, the National Guard of such State, Territory, or District shall be debarred, wholly or in part, as the President may direct, from receiving from the United States any pecuniary or other aid, benefit, or privilege authorized or provided by this act.

SEC. 118. Annual estimates required: The Secretary of War shall cause estimates to be submitted annually to provide the amounts necessary to carry out such provisions of this act as relate to the National Guard, and no money shall be expended under said provisions except as shall be specifically appropriated therefor.

SEC. 119. Applicable to land forces only: The provisions of this act in respect to the militia shall be applicable only to the militia organized as a land force, and shall take effect on July 1, 1916.

SEC. 120. All laws and parts of laws in so far as they are inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, in view of the fact that a number of Senators have amendments to propose, I think probably we had better take up the bill by sections now so that they can consider the amendments that are proposed.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator in charge of the bill a question?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. OVERMAN. I notice that in the House bill as reported, from page 1 to page 105, there are certain sections stricken out. Do I understand that the committee has reported the Hay bill, which passed the House?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the committee report that bill back to the Senate with the recommendation that it do not pass, but that the substitute contained in the pages from 105 to the end of the bill be passed?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say that there are quite a number of sections in the House bill that are not essentially different from the provisions of the Senate bill which we have reported as a substitute for the House bill, so that we are now considering the Senate bill as an amendment to the House bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. As an amendment?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. As a whole?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. As a whole.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Or as a substitute.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is an amendment. Now, say that we take up section 1 here. It is stricken out by the committee. The Senate has taken no action on it. The committee reports back the Hay bill in this bill, with lines running through it, so that it is stricken out.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then the Senate takes no action on that at all. It takes the action on the proposed substitute?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I understand that that will be the action of the Senate. If the Senator wants to amend the Senate bill by reinserting any provision of the House bill, it is open to amendment, of course.

Mr. OVERMAN. Suppose there are some provisions in the Hay bill that I like better than I do the corresponding provisions in the Senate bill?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think it would be perfectly proper to offer them as amendments to the Senate bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then we are not going to take up section 1, that is stricken out here and reported back by the committee?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No, sir.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is here stricken out. The Senate has not stricken it out, but the committee has stricken it out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). If the Senator from North Carolina will yield for a moment, the Chair will state the parliamentary situation as he understands it. The Senate may proceed to perfect the part stricken out, if it so desires, and then to perfect the part offered as a substitute, and each will be first perfected before the amendment is voted on as a substitute for the original.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Chair pleases, the chairman of the committee does not understand it that way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was stating what he understands; and then it is in the hands of the Senate.

Mr. CURTIS. Why, Mr. President, under the rules, what right have we to amend the provisions stricken out by the Senate committee? The only thing that is before us is the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They are not stricken out until the Senate votes to strike them out. This is a proposition which comes from the Senate committee to amend by substituting, and the original must be first perfected if anyone desires to offer amendments. Then the substitute is to be perfected, and then the Senate will vote to substitute, if it desires, or it will refuse to substitute.

Mr. CURTIS. Does the Chair hold that the House provisions that have been stricken out may be perfected?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. OVERMAN. The chairman of the committee does not understand it that way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the rule, as the Chair understands it.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is exactly what I say; but the chairman of the committee says this is a substitute for the whole House bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is just offered as a substitute. It has not been adopted as a substitute.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand it has not.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think the Chair has stated the rule correctly, with one exception. The rules provide that the substitute can be perfected as well as the original bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is what the Chair stated.

Mr. SMOOT. The Chair, however, stated that first the original bill had to be perfected, and then the substitute. I will say to the Chair that the Senate can proceed to perfect the substitute first, and then it can be offered as a substitute for the whole of the original bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is a matter entirely in the hands of the Senate. They may proceed to perfect either at their choice.

Mr. SMOOT. That is right. I agree with the Chair now.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Then, Mr. President, I move that we proceed to perfect the proposed substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon moves that the Senate proceed to perfect the proposed substitute.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate now has before it for amendment the substitute offered by the committee.

Mr. OVERMAN. I suggest that we take it up by sections.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered. The Secretary will read the first section of the substitute for the purpose of amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think we ought to have a larger number of Senators present, Mr. President. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Nelson	Smoot
Bankhead	Hollis	Overman	Sterling
Beckham	Hughes	Page	Sutherland
Brandegee	Husting	Poindexter	Swanson
Catron	James	Pomerene	Thomas
Chamberlain	Johnson, S. Dak.	Saulsbury	Thompson

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). The Chair has been requested to announce that the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] is necessarily absent from the Senate. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have been requested to announce the necessary absence of the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] on official business.

Mr. CHILTON. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. GOFF] on account of illness.

Mr. CATRON. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. FALL] is absent on account of official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, before proceeding with this measure, I will state that I understand there are quite a number of Senators who have set speeches to make on the bill; and, while I want to speed this measure as much as it is possible to do so, I do not want to undertake to amend the bill in advance of some speech bearing directly upon the subject in hand. Either the bill may be out of place or the speech may be out of place if it is made out of proper order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I suggest that the Senator, in his able speech this morning, and one that was very lucid in many respects—though I could not keep up with all the figures—has included a list of figures, which will appear in the RECORD in the morning and which we would all like to examine. I do not want to delay this bill at all. I join with the Senator in saying that I should like to see it disposed of as soon as possible; but I believe we would make time if he should let it go over and let us hear the speeches to-morrow, if anybody wants to speak, and let us look at the RECORD and see those figures and the important matters that he has published in the RECORD, and then take it up. I suggest that he let it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is not the Senator from Iowa to speak this afternoon?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have no desire in the world to do anything that might possibly impede the progress of this bill; and Senators here of longer experience than I think possibly it might hasten the matter if they could discuss it at length to-morrow. I am perfectly willing to have the bill go over until to-morrow; but I want the Senate to understand that I am going to press the bill after to-morrow morning, and, if necessary, to ask the Senate for evening sessions.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield to me?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. No Senator is more anxious than I am to expedite the consideration of this bill and every other bill that may come before the Senate; but I really think it would be better to let it go over until to-morrow, and let Senators digest the Senator's speech, which is a very able and interesting one; and then, if Senators have set speeches to make, it occurs to me that they might well be made before we take up the bill for amendment. That would be my suggestion.

Mr. SMOOT. There is one notice already given for a speech to-morrow.

Mr. SIMMONS. Do I understand the Senator as saying that after to-day he will not put the bill over again because nobody is ready to go on and speak?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No; after to-day, giving the Senators a full opportunity to look into the figures and statements I have put in the RECORD this morning, and the report of the committee that has been filed, they ought to be prepared to take up the matter and push it to a conclusion. Therefore, while I am perfectly willing to let it go over to-day, so far as I am concerned, after to-day I shall urge this bill upon the attention of the Senate until it is concluded.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that is a wise procedure.

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope the Senator will adhere to that.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I certainly will, if I can only have the Senator's assistance and presence here. In view of that, Mr. President, I request that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be temporarily laid aside.

FEDERAL JUDGES.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 706, to amend section 260 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator from Georgia that we take up the unobjected bills on the calendar under rule 8 and dispose of them, and then return to the bill referred to by him.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That, Mr. President, is an obstacle in the way of taking up bills that are objected to. I think a bill that is objected to is entitled to a hearing just as much as one that is not objected to.

Mr. SMOOT. I believe that is so; but——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yielded last week, Mr. President, when there were several hours that I might have had, and the bill lost its place. I think this is the chance for us to have two hours and a half on this bill. I have said all I want to say, and I hope the Senators on the other side will express their objections.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to suggest to the Senator that there are 16 pages of bills on the calendar under Rule VIII. I do not believe it would take more than an hour and a quarter to consider the bills to which there is no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I can not consent to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 706, the title of which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 706) to amend section 260 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. KERN (when Mr. FLETCHER's name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence on official business of the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], who is paired with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). Under an arrangement with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], I transfer my pair to his pair, and they stand paired, and therefore we are at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). Under the statement made by the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], I am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I desire to ask if the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I transfer the pair I have with that Senator to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER (after having voted in the negative). Having a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], who has not voted, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the negative). I withdraw my vote, as I observe that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], with whom I have a pair, is not present.

Mr. CURTIS (after having voted in the negative). I desire to ask if the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. CURTIS. I withdraw my vote, having a pair with him. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], who is absent. On that account I withdraw my vote.

Mr. GRONNA. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CATRON (after having voted in the negative). I wish to inquire if the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. CATRON. I have a pair with that Senator, and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. HARDING. I wish to inquire if the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. HARDING. I withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. OVERMAN (after having voted in the affirmative). I wish to inquire if the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have a pair with that Senator. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD], and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CHILTON. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS. I inquire whether the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. MYERS. I have a pair with that Senator. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. THOMPSON. I have been requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] on official business.

Mr. OLIVER. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] and therefore withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce that the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] is paired with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 22, as follows:

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 706) to amend section 260 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I was not here the other day during the discussion by the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], but, as I understand it, this is what might be properly called a Democratic emergency bill, providing an opportunity for appointing 19 Federal judges, involving an additional cost, if they are all appointed, as I understand it, of $124,000 to the already accumulating great deficiency.

I make this statement in order that we may start in properly with an understanding of the measure before the Senate as the discussion goes on.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, this bill is one to which I hesitate to address myself. It is a bill, notwithstanding the able argument made by the Senator from Georgia, about which there are very great differences—in the first place as to its constitutionality. But at this time I do not care to discuss that phase of it. I simply want to put before the Senate, as the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] did, the exact import of the bill.

The difficulties at which the bill is apparently aimed are not arising now for the first time. They are inherent in our system. Those difficulties have been met from time to time in a manner that has been satisfactory thus far. That relief can still be afforded at this time. I think there is no Member of the Senate who is not willing, when a judge of the circuit court of appeals or a district judge is incapacitated for his duties and where he fails to avail himself of our retirement statute, that we shall provide by appropriate legislation for relief in that particular case. We have done it heretofore. There is no reason why we can not do it again. But here is a net thrown out over the entire judicial system of the United States save only the Supreme Court, and why it should stop at the Supreme Court, in view of the evident purpose of the bill, passes my comprehension.

This bill would have the exact effect stated by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. By one act we place in the hands of the President of the United States the appointment of 19 additional judges if, in his judgment, the cause of justice may be better carried on. Now, why should we stop at 19? If it is proper to give the President this power to appoint additional judges when, in his view of the situation, the interests of justice demand additional judges, why not leave him free to appoint as many as he sees fit?

In Maryland and in various other districts we have made special provision that an additional judge shall be appointed, but that when a vacancy occurred the number of judges of the district should relate back to its original number, and the same in the circuit. Why not leave that as it is now? Simply because it becomes necessary to provide 19 additional places on the Federal bench in this year of grace 1916.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator let me ask him a question?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Certainly. I do not know that I can answer it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What influenced Mr. Justice McReynolds, when Attorney General, three years ago in making the recommendation?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. We know about recommendations. I will ask the Senator from Georgia if he will vote for the additional recommendations that have been made by Attorneys General during the last 12 or 13 years?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not know what they are.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not feel bound by a recommendation which is simply political in its effect. The Senator never would bring this bill before the Senate if there were in it a provision that not more than one-half of these judges should be appointed from one political party. Will he accept an amendment of that sort?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I would be glad to accept an amendment to the general judiciary law that not more than one-half the judges should be appointed from any political party.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will ask the Senator in regard to this particular bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will as to this and as to the law generally.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I shall call the attention of the Senator to that admission when the bill is up for amendment; and I hope those who collaborate with him on this bill will be as disinterested politically as the Senator from Georgia.

But, Mr. President, this is not an emergency measure, although it seems to be made so. It sets aside the Army bill; it sets aside the calendar of unobjected cases. It occurs to me that as to the emergency which the Senator says exists and which everybody acknowledges does exist in some cases we can relieve those cases without passing a general bill of this sort.

It is an injustice, in the first place, upon the judges who are already upon the bench. It is an injustice because it takes from them some of the dignity and some of the authority which they now have and which they by right have. I can not see that the political necessity even exists for the passage of the bill at the present time.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Martine, N. J.	Smith, S. C.
Bankhead	Hollis	Myers	Smoot
Beckham	Hughes	Nelson	Sterling
Brandegee	James	Newlands	Sutherland
Catron	Johnson, S. Dak.	Oliver	Swanson
Chamberlain	Jones	Page	Taggart
Chilton	Kenyon	Pittman	Thomas
Clapp	Kern	Poindexter	Thompson
Clark, Wyo.	Lane	Pomerene	Townsend
Cummins	Lee, Md.	Saulsbury	Vardaman
du Pont	Lippitt	Sheppard	Walsh
Gallinger	Lodge	Sherman	Warren
Gronna	McCumber	Shields	Weeks
Harding	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ga.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, it is not my desire to have the RECORD state anything except the facts of the debate. I understood the Senator from Georgia to say that he would be perfectly willing to accept an amendment to this bill providing that not more than one-half the judges to be appointed now under the bill should be from one political party, and I made a few remarks with that notion in mind.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That was not what I meant. What I meant and what I said was this——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, the Senator now informs me that he understood me to make such a statement based upon his supposed statement, and he informs me that he did not make the statement.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The statement that I made, Mr. President, was that I would be glad to see a provision of law which would not allow more than half the judges appointed to be from either party. I did not mean simply as to this amendment of the law. Just as soon as there is an equal number of circuit court judges from some other party than the Republican Party, then I would be glad to see the continuation of an equal division.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Of course, I do not want to enter into any controversy with the Senator. I remember perfectly well the statement which he made, which I replied to at the time. I asked him if he would be willing to have that rule applied to the present case, and I understood him to answer that he would. The stenographer's notes, of course, will show what he said, but it does not matter, because I know the Senator would not be willing——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. To have the appointments divided under this bill. I know that his purpose is to get 16 Democratic Federal judges, and perhaps he will get them.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I find that others around me understood me to have made that statement, and as I did not——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am not questioning the Senator's statement.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not intend to make it and it was not made. I went over to the Senator and asked him as to what he understood me to say, and I told him if my language indicated that, it was an inadvertence and it was not what I meant. I simply meant to say that I would be glad to see the general distribution as to the entire bench equaled. I did not mean that I would be willing, as to such judges as were appointed under this bill during the next 12 months, that half of them should be Republicans when three-fourths of the judges now are Republicans.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The misunderstanding was not as to what the Senator meant but as to what he said. I misunderstood what he said. I knew very well all the time what he meant.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What I said was what I meant. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will not continuously remind the occupants of the galleries that they must be quiet during discussions on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I had assumed that the bill under consideration this afternoon would be continued during the day, knowing its very great importance and the impatience of the people of the United States upon the subject to which it relates. I have in my office some material that I intended to use upon the debate of the bill which the Senator from Georgia has now brought before the Senate. I will not be able to use it at this moment, and must recall, as best I can, the essential facts with regard to our judicial system.

There are certain judges of the circuit court of appeals and certain other judges of the district court of the United States who ought to be removed from the offices they hold, not because of anything that they are doing, but because they are doing nothing. They are incapable by reason of physical infirmities for the performance of the duties which fall upon a judicial officer. I believe they can be removed if Congress would take the proper action and enact the proper procedure. I believe that if a judge of any court of the United States is incapable of rendering the service which his appointment requires and his office demands, and after the incapacity is manifest continues in the office, he is guilty of misconduct or misbehavior in office, and for such misconduct or misbehavior he can be removed. That is to say, the tenure of his office can be terminated and is terminated by the proper ascertainment of the fact of incapacity.

Some time ago I introduced a resolution directing the Judiciary Committee of the Senate to make an inquiry into this subject and report a proper procedure for the removal of Federal judges who were incapable of performing their duties. The resolution is now before the Judiciary Committee, and I assume that very soon the inquiry will be made and the procedure reported. I have a right to assume that it will be done because of the well-known celerity and promptness with which that committee considers all matters that are referred to it. I had hoped that the Senator from Georgia and other friends of the bill now under consideration would defer any effort to debate it until the inquiry I have suggested could be made and until the Senate could have an opportunity to pass upon the wisdom and legality of the report that will follow the inquiry.

It must be manifest to all Senators that it is infinitely better to remove in a lawful way judges who have become incapable of giving service to the public, whether those judges be 40 years of age or 70 years of age, than to attempt in the manner that is provided in the bill before us to remove, through legislative enactment and through an unauthorized delegation of power to the President of the United States, judges against the plain command and mandate of the Constitution.

I have often observed very dangerous approaches to the confines of the Constitution; some of those approaches are now before the Senate; but, so far as I remember, the ventures which touch the limit of our constitutional power are always undertaken in order to accomplish some wise, worthy, necessary, humane purpose. That is not true of this bill. It violates the Constitution of the United States plainly in two particulars, and for what object? In order that certain judges who may or may not have become incapacitated for work may be retired by the order of the President whenever he believes it is for the public good.

I hope that the Senate will be exceedingly deliberate in considering a question of that kind. I know the situation of the circuit in which the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] lives; I think it is known to all the members of the Judiciary Committee, and possibly to all the Members of the Senate. I believe with him that one at least of the judges of the circuit court of appeals in that circuit should resign and give opportunity for the appointment of an able-bodied man. In so saying it must not be understood that I am in the least degree criticizing the eminent judge, who has through a third of a century or more administered justice in the southern country with as fine a sense of fairness and equity as can be found in the annals of jurisprudence. The fact just stated, however, does not warrant the Senator from Georgia, in my opinion, in making the attempt to secure additional judicial force in that circuit in the way provided in this bill.

With these preliminary remarks, which will indicate, I am sure, my general view of the subject, I beg the attention of the Senate anew to some of the provisions of the measure. I hope the Senator from Georgia and all other Senators will understand that I am not dealing with this subject in a political way or viewing it from a political standpoint. I hope that my colleagues will believe that I would be as firmly and persistently opposed to the bill had we a Republican President as I am under a Democratic President. Those considerations do not affect my judgment in the least degree.

I am opposed to the measure, because, first, I believe it to be in direct contravention of two of the most vital parts of the Constitution; and, second, because, if it were constitutional, it would be in the highest respect unwise to invest an executive officer with the power which this bill proposes to bestow upon the President of the United States.

Senators have already been advised that we have at the present time several judges who are beyond the age of 70 years, and who might resign with full compensation, and that within the next year many other judges will have passed beyond the age of 70 years. So that it is said—and I have verified the statement with some examination—that in the next year, if the President thought it for the public good, he could practically retire something like 19 Federal judges and appoint as many in their stead.

One of the peculiar things about this measure is that it does not apply to the Supreme Court of the United States. I have often wondered why the author of the bill did not extend it to the Supreme Court if it is wise to make the provision here made for the circuit courts of appeal and for the district courts. The Supreme Court of the United States is constitutionally as vulnerable to the attack made upon the judiciary in the bill as is either the circuit court of appeals or the district court. If a judge who has passed beyond the age of 70 years, and refuses to resign, or does not resign, ought to be retired, and if his judicial power, no matter what may be his physical and mental condition, should be taken away from him, the reason is as potent in its application to the Supreme Court as it is to any other Federal court.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Iowa a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I ask the Senator from Iowa whether or not the reason in the case which he is supposing would not be stronger as applied to the Supreme Court, because there is a certain degree of flexibility in the circuit court of appeals and in the district court; that is, the judges are to a certain extent interchangeable. If a judge upon the bench of the circuit court of appeals is incapacitated, a district judge may be called to take his place and may sit upon the circuit court of appeals; if a district judge is incapacitated, another district judge may be assigned to take his place; but no such condition exists as to the Supreme Court of the United States. Nobody else can be called into that court. So, if there are degrees in a matter of that kind, I ask the Senator from Iowa whether he does not think the reason would be stronger in favor or such legislation as to the Supreme Court?

Mr. CUMMINS. Undoubtedly, Mr. President, the observation of the Senator from Utah has great weight, and I was about to touch upon that phase of the subject. The remark I had made was that, constitutionally speaking, the Supreme Court of the United States can be dealt with in precisely the same way as the circuit court or the district court can be dealt with. From the other point of view, that of policy, there is, as the Senator from Utah has stated, a much more persuasive reason for at all times keeping the Supreme Court full of able-bodied men under 70 years of age than exists with regard to the other Federal courts.

I hardly dare to suggest the reason—and it is a pure conjecture on my part—but I have sometimes thought it was a wholesome fear of the Supreme Court of the United States that kept that exalted tribunal out of the purview or operation of the proposed law. I can understand this reasoning in the minds of some Senators who have considered this bill—not that the reasoning has been expressed to me—but I can imagine that they are thinking that it might be easier to sustain the constitutionality of the act if the Supreme Court were omitted from it than it would be if the Supreme Court were included in it; and I rather admire the discretion on the part of those who have favored the bill in hesitating to excite the animosity of that great tribunal. I can understand how it might be thought by some Senators that the Supreme Court would look with greater favor upon the bill in its present form, because there are members upon the Supreme Court of the United States who are more than 70 years of age and who could at this time resign, and some of them could have resigned long ago, under the generous provisions of the legislation giving them their full salaries during their lives. I do not believe that the people of this country want the justices of the Supreme Court who are above 70 years of age to retire compulsorily. I know, and the Senator from Georgia knows, that some of them have rendered their most notable service after they passed the landmark which, under the laws of the country, gave them the right to cease work.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator was speaking of the Supreme Court. Has the Senator the data before him of the ages of the justices of the present Supreme Court?

Mr. CUMMINS. That is one of the matters of which I spoke in the beginning. I have that information on my table in my office. I think, however, that I could state the ages of those who have passed 70 years, but I hesitate to do so.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will do so in order to incorporate it in the RECORD, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well; I will be very glad if the Senator from Illinois will do so.

Mr. SHERMAN. There are three of the justices of the Supreme Court now who have passed the age, according to this bill, of judicial usefulness. There is one of them who soon will reach the age of three score years and ten. The Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, I may add, with the Senator's permission, is now 71 years of age, and, according to the contentions of some, ought to be retired if constitutional power will permit Congress to do so; an associate justice is now 73 years of age, and has reached that point of disability, because of the mere lapse of time, when, under this bill, he ought long ago, in keeping with official and judicial decency, to have retired. Another one, to make it a still more potent argument, is in his seventy-fifth year.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am very glad the Senator has made the statement, but I hope that all Senators will remember that I can yield only for questions, as I desire to continue this discussion.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa a question.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield for a question.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In view of what has already been said, does the Senator from Iowa remember the age at the time of his death of the Chief Justice who came from the State of the Senator from Illinois, Chief Justice Fuller?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not remember his age precisely, but I know he was much beyond 70 years when he died.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My recollection is that he was well up toward 80 years of age at the time of his death.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it is a false rule to apply to the judiciary, for very many of our judges in the long and honorable history of the judicial system of our country have performed their very best work after they had passed the age of 70. It may be assumed that such men are on the downward side of life, and it ought not to be surprising if some of them fail in their mental and physical strength; but the procedure for removal should be directed not to age, it should be directed to the man. If he has become feeble mentally or physically and unable to do his work, then he ought in some way to be removed, with the pension or compensation which this country very properly bestows upon her faithful servants; but if he is 71 or 72 or 73 years of age and is still strong mentally and physically and capable of rendering the service which he was appointed to render it is a refined cruelty, it is an exaggerated injustice to compel him to retire in the ignominious and humiliating way which this bill provides for his retirement. The method employed in the bill is infinitely worse than straightforward legislative removal.

Senators will remember that the plan of the bill is this, that when the new judge is appointed, after the President finds that the public good requires his appointment, the old judge continues nominally as a judge and nominally entitled to a seat in the court, but his honors are taken away from him; the new judge is given precedence and the old judge is permitted to do only those things which are specifically assigned him to do by either the circuit court of appeals in the one case or the Supreme Court of the United States in the other.

I can imagine the mortification felt by a judge who has held with honor and distinction a place in the public service for 25 years or more upon being being superseded by the entrance of a new appointee and being retired in the uncertain, vague way which is prescribed in this bill. But let me refer a little more carefully to the provisions of the bill, for it may be that I am assuming too much when I take it for granted that every Senator who hears me has read the bill.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, before my colleague leaves the point on which he was speaking I want to ask him a question about it. The bill recites:

> And the judge so entitled to resign shall thenceforth be relieved, save as hereinafter provided, from the duty imposed by section 118 of this title to sit as one of the judges of said circuit court of appeals, and shall be held and treated as if junior in commission to the remaining judges of said court, who shall, in the order of the seniority of their respective commissions, exercise such powers and perform such duties as by law may be incident to seniority.

What does that mean? What are the duties incident to seniority? What is the new judge to do, and what is left for the old judge to do?

Mr. CUMMINS. There is nothing left for the old judge to do at all save to try a case here or there which may be specifically assigned to him to try. The incidents attaching to seniority, I take it, are those of presiding over the court—that is, in the circuit court of appeals in the fifth circuit, we will say, Judge Pardee is the presiding justice of the circuit court of appeals, but if this bill were to pass and a new judge were appointed, Judge Pardee would instantly lose the position of presiding justice and would become the junior of all the judges of that circuit and would be subject to the orders of the new presiding judge.

Mr. KENYON. Does my colleague not think that that is merely a polite or an impolite invitation to resign, and does he not think that the right to resign is about all the right any self-respecting judge has left?

Mr. CUMMINS. It strains my disposition toward accuracy to admit that it is a "polite way." I am rather inclined to think that it is a very impolite and abrupt way to ask these judges to resign.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, will my friend let me make an observation at this point?

Mr. CUMMINS. I will yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. STONE. In a sense it is a question.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. STONE. Both Senators from Iowa have just referred to the humiliation which might result to a judge who, under the provisions of this bill, would be impliedly invited to resign or upon whom limitation in the exercise of his judicial power might be placed to his humiliation. This thought is the one to which I wish to direct the attention of the Senator. No one else, no other official holding office under the laws of the United States, except a Federal judge, holds for life or can retire on full pay.

That is a very exceptional favor conferred upon our judges. It has not been very long since a very distinguished man represented the great State of Iowa in this body, whose term here extended over 30 years, and whose service here was especially distinguished in every way that tended to the public good as he saw it. He died of old age. He could not have retired, after more than 30 years of a great service to his country in this body, on full pay or on half pay. But a judge who has served a third of that time, when he has reached the retiring age, can go back to private life, and all the days of his years remaining draw from the Treasury what he would have drawn if he had continued in office. I say, it is a very exceptional favor that we pay to the men who are appointed to the bench, and which does not apply in any other branch of the public service; and other branches of the public service are just as useful to the public interest and welfare.

The thought I present to the Senator is this: When a man who holds a judicial position reaches the point where he can be retired, and who, if he is capable of any kind of intelligent consciousness of his own condition, must know that he can not discharge the duties of his office because of disabilities, physical, mental, or whatever they may be, and yet refuses to take advantage of this exceptional favor which the laws of the country give to him, is it a humiliation to him if the Congress of the United States, the men who make the laws in this body, many of whom render fully as important service to the Nation as he, and enjoy no such favors as he, see proper to say that if he refuses to surrender his office either he shall be required to surrender it, or some one else shall be substituted to discharge the substantial duties of that place?

I think, Mr. President, if the Senator pleases, that the service of the Nation is entitled to some consideration while we are taking care of the sensitiveness of some judicial officer.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it is absolutely impossible to differ from the views just expressed by the Senator from Missouri, and if he had been here when I began my discussion of the bill he would have known that I hold the same opinion that he has expressed so much better than I could possibly express it. I agree with the Senator from Missouri that when a judge, whether he is 70 years of age or 40 years of age, whether he is entitled to retire upon full pay or not, becomes incapable of doing the work of his office he ought to be removed from his office, for the people are entitled to a man so qualified, both mentally and physically, that he can perform the full measure of the work allotted to a judge. The difficulty with the bill, however—and I suspect the Senator from Missouri is not familiar with it—is that it gives the President the power to retire the judge, no matter what his physical or mental condition may be, if he has passed the age of 70 years.

Mr. STONE. I did not understand that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think the Senator's statement is rather extreme. It may give him the power, but if he——

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from Georgia will allow me just a moment, I will yield to him. The principle of the bill, if established, will authorize Congress, in turn, to delegate to the President the power to retire in the same way a man of 30 years of age, or 40, or 50. The fact that the limitation in the bill is 70 years of age is not important, so far as the principle is concerned.

Now, I will show the Senator from Missouri that I am right, with regard to the matter of which I spoke. It is assumed that this applies only to judges more than 70 years of age, and who could retire upon full pay:

> In the event any circuit judge, having so held a commission or commissions at least 10 years continuously, and having attained the age of 70 years, as aforesaid, shall nevertheless remain in office, the President, if in his opinion the public good so requires, may appoint—

There is no standard of judgment upon the part of the President. Whenever he thinks that the public good requires the retirement of a particular judge he may appoint his successor, if the judge in office is more than 70 years of age and has been in office more than 10 years.

The Senator from Missouri had in mind that it was wise policy to retire a judge who had become unable, through physical or mental infirmities, to perform the work of his office; and with that conclusion, I think, no man can differ. But is the Senator from Missouri willing to say that instead of requiring the President or any other tribunal to find that the particular judge is incapable of work, if he shall find simply that the public good would be promoted, the judge then should be retired?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not say that the President we now have would be guilty of any such injustice; but we might have a President who would think that the opinions of a particular judge were so inconsistent with his sense of the public welfare that he ought to be retired; and this bill would enable the President to retire any judge above the age of 70 years if he differs with him with respect to his judicial opinions.

I now yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator was not in the Chamber when I discussed this bill, and when I suggested to the Senate the substitution for the language used this language:

> If, in his opinion, the more efficient administration of the business of the court so requires.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I think that would be simply a paraphrase of the language now in the bill; and even if it were adopted it would not avoid the objection I am trying to establish.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will allow me, I stated at the time that I considered that was what the language in the bill now meant; but, lest there might be some doubt about it, I suggested the insertion of this substitute. I myself think the present language means practically the same thing.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from Georgia will so amend the bill as to create a tribunal before which the question of incapacity can be tried and determined, providing that upon the determination against the judge complained of he shall be removed from office, I will join with him in the endeavor to pass such a measure, for I think it is within our constitutional power to do it, and I think it would be very wise to do it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator's idea is to remove them from office upon the ground of lack of good behavior, and leave them with no compensation at all, as I understand?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly. It makes no difference to me about compensation. I think the policy of the law to pension our judges of long service is wise, but the first consideration is the public. The public which pays has a right to full service from the person it is paying; and the moment a judge, however unfortunate he may be, and however free from blame he may be, becomes incapable of doing the thing for which the public pays him, he ought to be removed.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Would the Senator, by that proposed legislation, prevent a man from receiving a salary as a Senator and also at the same time a salary as a retired judge?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, if I could accurately remember my Shakespeare, I would venture to quote a single couplet:

> Thou canst not say I did it; never shake
> Thy gory locks at me.

I am no more in sympathy with that——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have known the distinguished Senator from Iowa for quite a number of years, and I was quite aware of the fact that he had never had any experience on the bench, and therefore I did not charge him with having——

Mr. CUMMINS. I know perfectly well to whom the Senator from Ohio refers, and I must decline to draw his affairs into this very interesting debate.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa why he thought the Senator from Ohio had gory locks? [Laughter.]

Mr. CUMMINS. That is just what embarrassed me when I came to quote this couplet and I looked across at my friend from Ohio and observed how inappropriate the quotation would be.

Mr. POMERENE. I did not think my friend from Utah would refer to my lack of locks. [Laughter.]

Mr. CUMMINS. If I have answered the Senator from Missouri—and I really intended to do it—I now proceed with the development of the bill. I am very anxious that the RECORD shall show just what it is, and I intend to read it, or certain parts of it, and comment upon it as I proceed.

The first section, which is a reenactment of section 260 of the laws relating to the judiciary, reads:

When any judge of any court of the United States, appointed to hold his office during good behavior, resigns his office, after having held a commission or commissions as judge of any such court or courts at least 10 years continuously, and having attained the age of 70 years, he shall, during the residue of his natural life, receive the salary which is payable at the time of his retirement for the office that he held at the time of his resignation.

What I have just read is the law at the present time. There is no change in those respects.

The section then proceeds:

In the event any circuit judge, having so held a commission or commissions at least 10 years continuously, and having attained the age of 70 years as aforesaid, shall nevertheless remain in office, the President, if in his opinion the public good so requires, may appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, an additional circuit judge of said circuit—

I pause a moment at that point to suggest that Congress has no constitutional power to confer the authority here mentioned upon the President of the United States. This bill is to take effect as to any particular judge or circuit when, in the opinion of the President, the public good requires it. Is it possible that Congress can delegate to an executive officer the authority to put into operation a law when, in his opinion, the public good requires it?

I am quite familiar, I think, with those authorities or cases which the Senator from Georgia has in mind; but inasmuch as I am not equipped with the decisions, having been drawn suddenly into the debate, I am not prepared to read from them, and to draw those distinctions which surely exist between this case and the cases in which the President can find a fact, which, being so found, puts into operation a law of Congress.

Under this bill the President is not required to find a fact. He is required to utter an opinion. What is necessary for the public good is always an opinion. If anyone doubts that, let him remember what takes place in the Senate every day it is in session. I assume that all Senators debate bills and thereafter vote according to their opinions of the public good. Will anyone contend that when I stand here and say that in my opinion the public good requires the defeat of this bill I have found or stated a fact? Yet that is precisely what the President is authorized to do. I am doing what I can to convince the judgments of my brother Senators that this bill is contrary to the public good, but I would not venture to assert that my argument or my conclusion upon it could be regarded as a fact.

Therefore, inasmuch as it is acknowledged that we can not delegate to the President the authority to put into operation a statute of the United States whenever he looks upon it or regards it as for the public good, the unconstitutionality of this bill is just as apparent as the sun will be to us if we ever have a fair, clear day, which I am beginning to doubt.

I ask the Senators who have reflected upon the measure this question: Suppose we were to pass—as we will in a few days—the military reorganization bill, and we were to add, as a last section:

This bill, after it is passed by Congress and approved by the President, shall be put into operation whenever the President thinks the public good requires it, and shall be suspended whenever he thinks the public good requires it—

And so on ad infinitum. The illustration shows more clearly than any volume of argument that we can not confer upon the President the legislative power of determining what is good for the public welfare. It is not a part of the Executive authority. The Congress of the United States determines what is good and what is not good for the public interest, and it can not delegate that authority to any other branch of the Government.

But that is only the first collision with the Constitution. This bill has the peculiar distinction of colliding with that charter of our liberties at more than one point. I read:

Who—

Speaking of the judge who is to be appointed—notwithstanding the incumbency of the judge so entitled to resign, shall sit customarily as one of the judges of the circuit court of appeals of his circuit. And the judge so entitled to resign shall thenceforth be relieved, save as hereinafter provided, from the duty imposed by section 118 of this title to sit as one of the judges of said circuit court of appeals, and shall be held and treated as if junior in commission to the remaining judges of said court, who shall, in the order of the seniority of their respective commissions, exercise such powers and perform such duties as by law may be incident to seniority.

We have seen what place the new judge is to take in the court. Now let us see what happens to the old judge:

Provided, That the presiding judge of the said circuit court of appeals, whenever in his judgment the public good shall so require, may thereafter, from time to time, designate the judge so entitled to resign to sit upon the hearing of any cause or causes in the said circuit court of appeals. And the Chief Justice of the United States may, upon like occasion, thereafter designate and appoint any such circuit judge so entitled to resign to service upon the circuit court of appeals of any other circuit; and he may likewise be designated and appointed, as provided by section 18 of this title, to hold a district court in any district, either within or without his said circuit.

Those who have followed the reading of the paragraph which I have just quoted will observe that after the appointment of the new judge the old judge can do nothing whatsoever unless some duty is specially designated for him by the presiding judge of the circuit court of appeals or by the Chief Justice of the United States. His authority after that time is limited to the commissions which may be imposed upon him, not by the law but by one or the other of these judges. He can do nothing—neither try a case nor sign an order nor perform the least of the functions of a judge—unless he is authorized to do it by the designation of the presiding judge of the circuit court of appeals or the Chief Justice of the United States.

I beg that Senators will observe that condition, because it furnishes the foundation for the proposition I am about to make. The bill not technically but in fact retires the judge from his judicial office. It deprives him of the power which under the law he was authorized to exercise when he was appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. The Constitution of our country says that the judge so appointed and commissioned shall hold his office during good behavior. Nothing has been found to impeach his good behavior in the operation of the bill to which I have referred, and the appointment of the new judge by the President and the finding that the appointment is required by the public good robs the judge appointed under the Constitution, and entitled to all its protection, of the powers of his office and removes him from the office as effectually as though it had been done by impeachment or by some other procedure which determined that there had been misconduct or misbehavior in office. Is it asserted that Congress in the first instance and the President in the second instance can remove or retire a judge appointed under the Constitution from his office unless he is guilty of misbehavior or has been found to have committed high crimes and misdemeanors? No; there is no lawyer who will so declare.

My distinguished friend from Georgia finds constitutional ground for this bill, as I understand it, in the thought that the retirement of the judge or the disposition of the judge in the manner I have read is not the equivalent of a removal from his office, that he continues still to hold the title of judge, and that consequently the Constitution is not invaded. These are not the days to consider form rather than substance. There may have been a generation that would have given some attention to a technicality of that sort, but if there was, the generation has gone, and very happily and fortunately gone, and in these times we look to substance. Whoever seeks to sustain the position that we may deprive a judge of all his functions, take away from him all the power that the office confers upon him or all that inheres in the office, and still claim that he has not been removed or that he is still a judge, will have undertaken a most difficult task. I can not agree to it. I can not concur in any such conclusion.

The remaining part of the bill I need not read, for it relates to the district judges and it makes exactly the same provision for the district courts and judges which I have read respecting the circuit court of appeals.

Mr. President, I have so great confidence in the sincerity of the Senator from Georgia, I have so great respect for his legal learning, and I feel so sure that he desires nothing but the public welfare, that I appeal to him not to wreck the Constitution, not to overthrow a policy as old as the Government itself and that has maintained itself in the confidence of the people, in order to reach a very worthy object.

What he desires is another circuit judge in the fifth circuit, and I for one, as he knows, am willing to give it to him, for I have become familiar with the conditions of that circuit, and can not question his statement to the effect that owing to age and infirmity on the part of one of the circuit judges the people in that part of the country are in danger of being denied the prompt administration of justice. I think he would find among the Senators upon this side of the Chamber general concurrence in the views I have expressed, and I sincerely commend that course to him.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I think, if this important bill is to proceed further to-night, we should have a quorum present. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brandegee	James	Overman	Smith, Ga.
Chamberlain	Johnson, S. Dak.	Page	Smith, S. C.
Chilton	Jones	Pittman	Smoot
Clapp	Kenyon	Poindexter	Sterling
Clark, Wyo.	Kern	Pomerene	Stone
Cummins	Lippitt	Saulsbury	Sutherland
Dillingham	McCumber	Shafroth	Swanson
Gallinger	Martin, Va.	Sheppard	Taggart
Hitchcock	Martine, N. J.	Sherman	Tillman
Hollis	Myers	Shields	Vardaman
Hughes	Nelson	Simmons	Wadsworth

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-four Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. KERN. Let the Secretary call the absentees.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll of absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-four Senators have answered to the roll call.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. STONE. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the presence of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Sergeant at Arms will carry out the instructions of the Senate.

Mr. WALSH, Mr. RANSDELL, Mr. LANE, Mr. SMITH of Michigan, Mr. OLIVER, and Mr. WARREN entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. STONE. I move that further proceedings under the order of the Senate be vacated.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 8493. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 13043. An act making appropriations to supply further additional urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1916 and prior fiscal years; and

H. R. 13768. An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the Military Establishment for the fiscal year 1916.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair presents petitions from the Pedro Cintron, of Patillas; the congregation of the Methodist Church of Carnerio; the Methodist Brotherhood Albion, No. 1334, of Guayama; and the congregation of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Vieques, in the island of Porto Rico, praying for prohibition in that island. The petitions will be referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Atlantic City, N. J., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to limit the freedom of the press, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. WADSWORTH present a memorial of sundry citizens of Medina, N. Y., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to provide for the closing of barber shops in the District of Columbia on Sunday, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Ithaca, N. Y., praying for Federal censorship of motion pictures, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. LODGE presented a memorial of the Massachusetts State Branch of the Woman's Peace Party, remonstrating against an attempt by the United States to acquire any of the territory of Mexico, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill (S. 3526) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the registration of, with collectors of internal revenue, and to impose a special tax upon all persons who produce, import, manufacture, compound, deal in, dispense, sell, distribute, or give away opium or cocoa leaves, their salts, derivatives, or preparations, and for other purposes," reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 316) thereon.

Mr. POMERENE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the bill (S. 3606) for the relief of the contributors of the Ellen M. Stone ransom fund, reported it without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CATRON:

A bill (S. 5311) for the relief of J. L. Campbell and others; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. POMERENE:

A bill (S. 5312) granting an increase of pension to Lieut. Col. James F. Charlesworth; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CLAPP:

A bill (S. 5313) relating to the building of highways and assessment of benefits and damages adjoining Indian allotments; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. ROBINSON:
A bill (S. 5314) for the relief of John W. Fein; to the Committee on Claims.
By Mr. CUMMINS:
A bill (S. 5315) to correct the military record of Jerome Chilson (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.
The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 28 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, March 30, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 29, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.
The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:
We bless Thee, Almighty God our heavenly Father, for the faith which holds us close to Thee when the clouds of sorrow and adversity come thick and fast about us, when friends deceive us, and hopes grow dim, but above all do we thank Thee for the constant and abiding faith which leads on through joy and sorrow, sunshine and cloud, to the full fruition of the perfected manhood in the Jesus of Nazareth. Give us, we beseech Thee, plenteously of that faith, that we may follow his lead in the common daily duties of life that Thy purposes may be fulfilled in us now and evermore. Amen.
The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY—SOUTH CAROLINA NAVAL MILITIA.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the Clerk will call the committees.
Mr. BURNETT (when the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization was called). Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. BURNETT. Under the rule under which the immigration bill was being considered I understood from the Speaker that that bill would not be in order to-day.
The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.
Mr. BURNETT. Then, Mr. Speaker, I have a resolution which the committee directed me to call up, House joint resolution 79.
The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.
The Clerk read as follows:

H. J. Res. 79. Authorizing the Secretary of Labor to permit the South Carolina Naval Militia to use the Charleston immigration station and dock connected therewith.

The SPEAKER. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.
Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, there is no objection, I think, to this resolution and I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that this resolution be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read the resolution.
The Clerk began the reading of the resolution.
Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. STAFFORD. Is this resolution being read the first time, or is it being read for amendment?
The SPEAKER. This is the first reading of the resolution.
Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the resolution.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the resolution. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read the resolution for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of Labor is authorized to permit the South Carolina Naval Militia to occupy the Charleston immigration station and the dock therewith connected and use them as an armory and place of landing under such conditions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Labor.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Amend, on page 2, line 7, by striking out the words "the Secretary of Labor" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "him."

Amend, by inserting after the word "him," at the end of line 7, the following: "Provided, That the State of South Carolina shall make, at its own expense, such repairs as may be necessary on said building and dock, ordinary wear and tear excepted, so long as the same is used for the purposes set forth in this resolution: Provided further, That the Secretary of Labor may take possession of and reoccupy said immigration station and dock, whenever, in his judgment, he may deem such possession and reoccupancy necessary."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the word "necessary," at the end of the amendment, and insert the word "desirable."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 15, by striking out the word "necessary" and inserting the word "desirable."

Mr. BURNETT. We have no objection.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of obtaining some information as to when this immigration station was constructed and at what cost.

Mr. BURNETT. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. WHALEY].

Mr. WHALEY. Mr. Speaker, it was erected in 1912 at a cost of about $50,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. At that time was there any anticipation of a great flood of European immigrants, so that this building was deemed essential to properly take care of them in the important port of Charleston?

Mr. WHALEY. Just about a year before a steamship entered with immigrants, but it was the only one. But it was never anticipated at that time that immigrants would come to the southern ports.

Mr. STAFFORD. The people of South Carolina did not then take a position in opposition to immigration, but were very desirous of having public buildings at Charleston?

Mr. WHALEY. They never have taken a position against desirable immigration at any time, but that boatload did not prove to be a desirable standard.

Mr. STAFFORD. Was that an instance where the local officials sought to bring over a large number for home settlement?

Mr. WHALEY. I think it was a movement through the State, not through the local authorities.

Mr. STAFFORD. I mean it was through the State officials?

Mr. WHALEY. Through the immigration department of the State.

Mr. BENNET. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will yield.

Mr. BENNET. Just for the purpose of saying to the gentleman from Wisconsin that this bill for the Charleston immigration building was one of three which we passed by unanimous consent in the Congress of which the gentleman was a Member, the Fifty-ninth Congress, the purpose being to induce desirable immigration through the ports of New Orleans, Charleston, and Galveston.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman mean that that purpose is accomplished, and this immigration station is to be abandoned?

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman from South Carolina is correct, and unfortunately that immigration did not come to Charleston but did continue to the ports of Galveston and New Orleans, so the project was about 66⅔ per cent successful.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHALEY. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Was the site at Charleston donated by the State or by the city to the Government?

Mr. WHALEY. I think not; I think the Government purchased the site.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I was under the impression it was donated, but I may be in error. Does the gentleman object to the amendment to the proviso on page 2, line 8, which would have the alterations made to the building subject to the approval of the Secretary of Labor?

Mr. WHALEY. The Secretary of Labor has recommended that in his annual report to Congress and has also written a letter about it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman does not understand. The proviso is that the State of South Carolina shall make at its own expense such repairs, and so forth, as may be necessary, but apparently the plans for these alterations are not to be submitted to anybody. It seems to me that the Secretary of Labor ought to see the plans before alterations are made, because the building eventually is to be turned back whenever the Secretary of Labor desires it. The proviso reads:

That the State of South Carolina shall make, at its own expense, such repairs as may be necessary on said building and dock, ordinary wear and tear excepted, so long as the same is used for the purposes set forth in this resolution.

I want to know whether the gentleman would consent to an amendment providing that the Secretary of Labor shall first see and approve these plans?

Mr. WHALEY. There are no alterations to be made, but simply repairs, so that the building would be kept in its present condition. There is no change to be made in it at all.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It says:

Such repairs as may be necessary on said building and dock.

Mr. WHALEY. Repairs only.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Why should not the Secretary of Labor have supervision of them?

Mr. FITZGERALD. He has enough to do without being bothered with it.

Mr. WHALEY. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania there never has been a door opened for immigration. There is only a caretaker there to-day, paid by the Government. The object of this is to relieve the Government of that expense and put it on the State of South Carolina.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Exactly. It is a fair and proper request, and I am in favor of it; but deteriorations may occur by reason of the occupancy of the premises by the Naval Militia of South Carolina, and the building is to come back to the Government after they are through with it. Why would the gentleman object to this sort of an amendment:

Provided, That the State of South Carolina shall, subject to the approval of the Secretary of Labor, make such alterations—

And so forth.

Mr. WHALEY. I think it is not necessary to burden the Secretary of Labor with these repairs. It is not going to change the building at all.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will permit me, I have seen this building.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Pardon me. Is this the final word?

Mr. FITZGERALD. If we did what ought to be done in this case, we would not let the State of South Carolina take this under a revocable permit. We would give it to them under condition that they would accept it absolutely or we would not give it to them at all. It is in a place where it is worthless for any purpose except for a boathouse, and the Secretary of Labor should not be worried by being compelled to pass upon every suggestion in regard to making repairs and keeping that building in serviceable condition.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The building is to be turned back in as good order as it is taken.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It ought not to come back.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I disagree with the gentleman as to that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The best thing that can be done, from the standpoint of the United States, is to get somebody to take this building off our hands. We ought to give it to the State of South Carolina. Although it has not been opened, we have had requests before Congress for money to furnish the staff necessary to conduct it, although the windows are boarded up and you can not enter it without a jimmy.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I know that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is partial to the station at Ellis Island, but I think it well sometimes to distribute a little bit of the immigration of the country, and let a part of it go to Charleston, or Galveston, or to any other place where there is shipping sufficient to warrant it. The ground having been bought by the Government, the buildings having been paid for by the Government, both now to be loaned to the Naval Militia of South Carolina, it seems to me no alteration should be made to that building, which is eventually to come back to the Government, without the approval of the Secretary of Labor.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It does not provide for alteration.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will yield, it seems to me I have a recollection that under the leadership of a Representative who, I believe, is now dead, that the site was acquired and the building was constructed, and it was constructed for the purpose of caring for immigration that would come into the port of Charleston. Now, then, has it ever been used for that purpose?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Never.

Mr. CANNON. Has there ever been any immigration into South Carolina?

Mr. BENNET. One ship.

Mr. CANNON. One ship, and one ship only.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It has been discouraged there, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. And it is not estimated that at any time in the future the port of Charleston would require the use of this station, which was erected for the purpose of protecting immigrants and protecting the United States?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That for which it is now no longer needed.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman give up hope that there ever will be any change of opinion touching immigration to that great port of South Carolina, where there is this great navy yard and great harbor?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I wish to say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that there is a development around about Charleston.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Before the Chair puts that request, he wants to straighten out the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois. Without objection, it will be agreed to. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] withdraws his pro forma amendment. Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Answering the inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], I will say it is true that there has been an unusual development around and about the port of Charleston, S. C. For many years there was no great activity there. When this immigration matter came along, Charleston was beginning to look up in matters of this kind, and she wanted to keep abreast of other cities that were seeking appropriations for the construction of immigration stations. It was in a sense an encouragement of the influx of labor that they thought they needed in South Carolina. But it is likewise true that, although they encouraged that labor, there came a time when immigration was discouraged, and it is not encouraged to any great extent to-day. But the time will come when it will be encouraged again, because South Carolina is continuing to look up. The port of Charleston is now the terminus of several of the great railroads of the country carrying coal and other products to the seaboard. It is on the line also of the great trunk-line waterway, which brings up commerce from the South and takes down commerce from the North. There is no reason why Charleston should give up its pursuit of any advantage that it may have through the possession of this immigration station, but I contend we ought not to give over the property absolutely, as seems to be the thought of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]. This land and these buildings that the Government has constructed there should not be turned over for the purposes of the State of South Carolina without some reservation; and the reservation I suggest is that if the buildings deteriorate or are altered to suit the purposes of the naval militia, then those alterations should be made only upon the approval of the Secretary of Labor, who has jurisdiction over the property.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the criticism of the gentleman from Pennsylvania of my colleague [Mr. FITZGERALD] was either correct or justified.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, I do not pay any attention to it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BENNET. And as applied to the rest of the New Yorkers, I do not think it was justified, either. One of these three bills was introduced by the late Mr. Legare, of Charleston; another was introduced by Gen. Meyer, of New Orleans; and the third by Mr. GREGG, of Texas. They were reported out of th Immigration Committee, of which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] was then a member and of which I was then a member, with the full concurrence of the members from New York City, who at that time were Col. Ruppert and myself, for the purpose of doing what we thought was right, and that was of diffusing trade throughout the United States through the ports that were most convenient to that trade. It was represented to us that from the back country of Charleston there would come commerce to the port of Charleston that would warrant the establishment of a line of steamers between that port and European ports, and similar representations were made with reference to the port of New Orleans and the port of Galveston. As to the latter two, the representations proved to have been founded upon sure knowledge. In relation to Charleston, for some reason or other, the development did not proceed, but there was no thought on the part of the Representatives of the great port of New York to hamper in any way that commerce.

I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] to the fact that he least of all should complain by reason of the passage of these acts. When he came into Congress, right after they had been passed, this House, at his request, passed an appropriation of $250,000 for an immigration station at Philadelphia; and I want to say that it is absolutely no fault of the House that, after we had appropriated the money, they found they could not build it in Philadelphia because there was no place in Philadelphia where they could build it, and they had to build it in New Jersey. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That statement being accurate and entirely commendable, so far as the activity of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was concerned, I will ask the gentleman whether, if I were now to introduce a bill proposing to lend the immigration station at Philadelphia to the Naval Militia, the gentleman would entirely concur in the thought that it ought to be lent, with the understanding that the Government should cease to exercise jurisdiction over it?

Mr. BENNET. Oh, Mr. Speaker, the circumstances are different.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman think we ought to lend an immigration station like that at Gloucester, N. J., to the Naval Militia of the State of Pennsylvania?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Oh, the gentleman should be informed. We have taken over and added to the port of Philadelphia since that time the whole State of Delaware, part of New Jersey, and most of the State of Pennsylvania. And now we do not take any back talk from New York or any other port. [Laughter.]

Mr. BENNET. And yet the gentleman complains although by reason of this act he not only got an appropriation for the construction of a building for $250,000 for the city of Philadelphia, but when they attempted to locate it in Pennsylvania they found they could not do it, and had to locate it in New Jersey, and he and others came down here in the summer, during the recess of Congress, and got an Executive order enlarging the jurisdiction of that immigration station and covering in the State of Deleware and a large part of New Jersey and a part of Pennsylvania and all of Philadelphia into the port of Philadelphia. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. I hope my colleague will not overlook the fact that they did not keep within the limit of cost, but had to have a law passed increasing the limit of cost.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That may be. We wanted to be put on a par with the port of New York, and we are perfectly happy at this time. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I think the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is entirely taken care of by the amendment here. I admit something of the force of his suggestion, but there is an amendment providing that the Secretary of Labor may take possession of and reoccupy the immigration-station buildings and dock whenever in his judgment he may deem such repossession and reoccupation desirable.

Mr. SABATH. That has been amended.

Mr. BURNETT. No; that is the amendment that we recommended, that the Secretary of Labor be permitted to reoccupy it whenever it should be found necessary.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Or desirable.

Mr. BURNETT. Yes. I understand that the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Illinois modifies it in that way. That is true. Now, if they are so repairing or refitting these buildings as to make them unfit for the Government to use them as an immigration station at any future time, under that clause the Secretary of Labor would be authorized and within his rights to take possession of them.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama how he would construe the word "necessary." Would it be absolutely necessary or the equivalent of "advisable"?

Mr. BURNETT. At the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois it was amended to make it "desirable" instead of "necessary." I thank the gentleman for calling my attention to it.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, believing that South Carolina is still a part and parcel of the United States and that it has not been taken in by Philadelphia, as has nearly everything else, according to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], I am sure we can easily afford to let the State of South Carolina use these premises, especially the Department of Labor, in view of the fact that they never have been occupied, and at this time has no possible use for them. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois that in a short space of time, when the State of South Carolina has acquired more knowledge of the benefits of immigration, it will be desirous of occupying the premises for the purpose for which the building was originally erected; but until that time I do not see any reason why we should not permit the State of South Carolina to use this building for the purpose desired, namely, State militia purposes, and I disagree very much with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] in his contention that we should require the Secretary of Labor to continue to have absolute control of the station. Inasmuch as the State, through its Naval Militia, will be in control, let it be in full control. It is not required that the Secretary of Labor should have charge of the premises that are not used by his department or by the Bureau of Immigration. For that reason I hope that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] will withdraw his amendment to the provision.

Mr. WHALEY. Mr. Speaker, it is not intended by this bill that the use of this building by the State of South Carolina shall be permanent. The object of the bill is simply to allow the Naval Militia to occupy this building while it is not being used by the Government of the United States. It has been erected for four years, and not a door has been opened. In order to use this immigration station, it will require improvements, including a sea wall and filling to connect it with the mainland. To-day there is simply a dock and a building. It costs the Government $70 a month for a caretaker, and the Government is making no use of it. The Naval Militia of South Carolina have no armory, and the object of this bill is simply to allow the Naval Militia to use this building as an armory and to encourage this splendid branch of the militia.

So far as the objection of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is concerned, the Naval Militia guarantee to keep the building in repair. It will not be necessary to make any improvements, except put lockers in one room on the ground floor. Upstairs there are two or three rooms which are now occupied by a caretaker.

Mr. SHERWOOD. How much has the Government expended on this building altogether?

Mr. WHALEY. I am informed between $50,000 and $55,000. Now, as I say, there is no desire on the part of the Naval Militia of South Carolina to occupy this building permanently. We do hope for immigration down South, but we want high-class, desirable immigrants; and at the port of Charleston, with deep water on the bar and in the harbor, with three large trunk lines coming into the city, large coal terminals, and with five coastwise steamship lines coming into the port, we expect one of these days to have foreign steamship lines, which may bring desirable immigrants. Therefore, when the time comes, when immigrants do come into the port, an immigration station will be there, which will make it convenient for them and the Government.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHALEY. I do.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman spoke of improvements which must necessarily be made to the present buildings to fit them for the use of the Naval Militia. Will there have to be such an improvement?

Mr. WHALEY. No; there will not have to be any improvement, so far as the Naval Militia are concerned. I said improvements would have to be made in order to fit it for a suitable immigrant station. It will require a sea wall in front of it; it will require filling around it; it will require a causeway to connect it with the mainland, which it has not to-day.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the State propose to bear that expense?

Mr. WHALEY. So far as the Naval Militia purposes are concerned, the State will only have to erect a causeway connecting the building with the mainland, and the State proposes to do that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I was wondering how it could be used by the Naval Militia if this work is not done.

Mr. WHALEY. All the Naval Militia needs is an armory. This building will furnish it. It requires a dock, which is there to-day, and these two things are all that are necessary.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am in sympathy with the proposition, but I do not yet understand the objection to the amendment which I have not offered, but have suggested, that whatever is done in the way of permanent improvements there, alterations to buildings and grounds, should be subject to the approval of the Secretary of Labor.

Mr. WHALEY. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that we tried to get the Secretary of Labor to turn this building over to us last April or May. He refused to do it on the ground that he did not have any legislative authority to do so. As a result, the building has been unoccupied since last May, and the Government has been paying $70 a month for a caretaker, while the Naval Militia have had to pay rent for an armory.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understand that. Still the gentleman does not get the point. So far as I am concerned, I am in favor of what the gentleman wishes; but what is the objection to letting the Secretary of Labor approve the plans?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. WHALEY] be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Why should there be any objection to having the plans for these alterations submitted to and approved by the Secretary of Labor?

Mr. WHALEY. The red tape that would have to be gone through in order to get the plans and improvements passed on would take months and months before the building could be occupied by the Naval Militia.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it simply a question of red tape with the gentleman?

Mr. WHALEY. I think red tape means a great deal when we want preparedness.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I sympathize with what the gentleman wants to do, and I will not offer the amendment; but in matters of this kind, where Government property is being taken, I think Government supervision should be retained. That is the only point I have to make.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last two words of the resolution. A few moments ago reference was made to the Philadelphia immigration station as being "finished." I wondered whether it was "finished" or "completed," because I notice in the annual report of the Secretary of Labor the statement that the station at Charleston, S. C., has been completed for several years but never finished. That is a distinction which we will shortly make use of here, because I can see the finish of this place as an immigration station if this resolution passes.

It is a curious commentary upon Congress, especially in view of the very general sentiment throughout the country, whether true or false, that there is a little too much pork-barrel legislation in Congress—it is a curious commentary upon Congress that a few years ago the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization reported into this House a series of bills for the erection of immigration stations. One of the bills was for an immigration station at Charleston, S. C., which they say has been completed for four years and never had an immigrant in it. The gentleman from South Carolina a moment ago said the doors had never been opened—that is, for the transaction of business—that by some process in the committee on immigration some gentlemen wanting a new station at New York, some at Philadelphia, and some at New Orleans, they provided one at South Carolina where there is no need whatever of an immigration station.

Congress in its wisdom or, I might more properly say, in its lack of knowledge, accepted the suggestion of the committee and authorized an immigration station at this point. I do not remember the cost of it, but probably $50,000 or $100,000, including the site.

They say it is completed but not finished. I do not know what is not finished, but it would probably cost a considerable sum to put it in use. Think of it, a body of business men, in control of the affairs of the Government, appropriating for a station at a point where there never had been any need of it, where there never was likely to be any need of it, and where after four years of maintenance we are giving it to South Carolina to avoid the payment of the expense of a caretaker.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I want the gentleman to know that in asking the question I do not do it in a partisan sense, because I have the same feeling for this kind of legislation that the gentleman has; but under what administration was it erected?

Mr. MANN. It was not under a Democratic administration. I do not remember whether the House was Democratic or not. It does not make any difference; it applies just as well when the Republicans are in control of the House as when the Democrats are in control. We are bad enough, the Lord knows, but you are a little worse. [Laughter.]

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I want to say that that is one of the best speeches the gentleman from Illinois ever made in this House condemning this legislation.

Mr. MANN. I have always condemned it.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I hope the gentleman as vigorously condemned it when it was passed through the House.

Mr. MANN. Very likely I did. I do not recollect; but I opposed many of these things then, and do now. I am making these remarks at this time because this House will have up similar questions of pork-barrel legislation that are new—that are not 4 years old. I hope the House will refuse to take up for consideration some of the pork-barrel bills made up along the same lines that this bill was, agreed to in committee some years ago.

The SPEAKER. All the pro forma amendments are withdrawn and debate is exhausted.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last two words of the amendment.

The SPEAKER. There is no amendment.

Mr. SABATH. There is a committee amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last two words of the committee amendment.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that I have at all times voted against all bills which might be designated as pork-barrel legislation, I presume that I will be permitted to state that I am pleased to hear from the gentlemen who now feel the same way, and agree to act in the future as I have acted in the past 8 or 10 years, namely, to oppose every proposition that might in any way be considered as pork-barrel legislation.

As I understand it, this appropriation for the immigration station at Charleston was passed in the Fifty-ninth Congress. I was not then a member of the Immigration Committee or a Member of this House, but I want to say for the Immigration Committee that since the Sixtieth Congress we have recommended the appropriations for two immigration stations—one for Philadelphia and the other for Baltimore. I am pleased to say that each and every member, and everyone acquainted with the conditions in those two ports, will admit that there was imperative need for the stations. I agree with my colleague from Illinois that frequently we appropriate for buildings that are not needed and are not necessary.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. In regard to pork-barrel legislation, spoken of by the two distinguished gentlemen from Illinois, I know little about it and, of course, have no particular reference to either of the gentlemen or to the city which they represent. Is it a fact that the center of opposition for legislation of this kind is found largely in the great cities and along the great wharves where public buildings have already been completed and that opposition is not found in those places which have not yet had public buildings? In other words, is the opposition to so-called pork-barrel legislation largely among those who are already provided?

Mr. SABATH. I agree with the gentleman that there may be a great deal of unjustifiable criticism in the newspapers and on the part of some people directed against the erection of public buildings or the improvement of our waterways. I know that some necessary bills have been unfairly designated as pork-barrel appropriations, but in the main the criticism has been deserved.

Personally, coming from a large city, I do not have the opportunity of reading the newspapers of the small towns and am not prepared to say whether or not there is any criticism of these bills in those periodicals. I am inclined to think that if the criticism is honest it is beneficial, and it certainly is detrimental if dishonest and unjustifiable.

We should at all times oppose any measures which tend to appropriate money for buildings which are not needed. This thing of showing favors and being good fellows at the expense of the Government should cease. We should not appropriate large sums of money here and there for the erection of post offices and other public buildings for the sake of good-fellowship.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the preamble.

Mr. BURNETT. That is all right; it was only put in for the information of the House.

The preamble was stricken out.

On motion of Mr. WHALEY, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE WILLIAM G. BROWN, JR.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 188.

Resolved, That Sunday, the 16th day of April, 1916, at 12 o'clock, be set apart for addresses upon the life, character, and public services of Hon. WILLIAM G. BROWN, Jr., late a Representative from the State of West Virginia.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

COTTONSEED STATISTICS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will continue the call of committees.

The Clerk called the Committee on the Census.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 4767) authorizing the Director of the Census to collect and publish statistics of cotton seed and cottonseed products, which is on the Union Calendar, and I ask unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky calls up the bill H. R. 4767, and asks unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The House will resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEELE] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 4767, with Mr. STEELE of Pennsylvania in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Director of the Census be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to collect and publish monthly statistics concerning the quantity of cotton seed received at oil mills, the quantity of seed crushed in such mills, the quantity of crude cottonseed products obtained, the quantities of these crude products sold and shipped out of the mills and the quantities on hand, the quantities of crude cottonseed oil held by refiners, by manufacturers of compound lard, butterine, oleomargarine, soap, and other users of cottonseed oil, and by brokers, exporters, warehousemen, and others handling these products, the quantity of compound lard, soap, butterine, and oleomargarine made, shipped, or held by manufacturers of these products either at the factory or elsewhere, and the quantity of cotton seed and cottonseed products imported and exported.

SEC. 2. That the information furnished by any individual establishment under the provisions of this act shall be considered as strictly confidential and shall be used only for the statistical purpose for which it is supplied. Any employee of the Bureau of the Census who, without the written authority of the Director of the Census, shall publish or communicate any information given into his possession by reason of his employment under the provisions of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not less than $300 or more than $1,000, or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both so fined and imprisoned, at the discretion of the court.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of every owner, president, treasurer, secretary, director, or other officer or agent of any cottonseed-oil mill, manufacturing establishment, warehouse, or other place where cottonseed products are produced, manufactured, or stored, whether conducted as a corporation, firm, limited partnership, or by individuals, when requested by the Director of the Census or by any special agent or other employee of the Bureau of the Census acting under the instructions of said director, to furnish completely and correctly, to the best of his knowledge, all of the information concerning the quantity of cotton seed received, consumed, or on hand, and the quantity of crude and refined oil, cake and meal, hulls and linters produced, and the quantity of these products sold and shipped and on hand, and the quantity of compound lard, butterine, and oleomargarine on hand. The request of the Director of the Census for information concerning the quantity of cotton seed received, consumed, and on hand, the quantity of crude oil and other products sold and shipped, and the quantity of crude oil consumed and products manufactured therefrom and stocks on hand may be made in writing or by a visiting representative, and if made in writing shall be forwarded by registered mail, and the registry receipt of the Post Office Department shall be accepted as evidence of such demand. Any owner, president, treasurer, secretary, director, or other officer or agent of any manufacturing establishment, warehouse, or other place where cotton seed and cottonseed products are manufactured or stored, who, under the conditions hereinbefore stated, shall refuse or willfully neglect to furnish any of the information herein provided for or shall willfully give answers that are false shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $300 or more than $1,000 or imprisoned for a period of not exceeding one year, or both so fined and imprisoned, at the discretion of the court.

With the following committee amendments:

On page 1, line 7, omit the word "obtained," and after the words "cottonseed products" insert the following: "and refined oil produced."

On page 1, line 8, omit the words "crude" and "sold and."

On page 1, line 9, after the word "quantities," insert the following: "of these products and of cotton seed."

On page 1, lines 13 and 14, omit the following words: "the quantity of compound lard, soap, butterine, and oleomargarine made, shipped, or held by manufacturers."

On page 2, line 1, omit the following: "manufacturers of these products either at the factory or elsewhere."

On page 3, line 4, omit the following: "sold and."

On page 3, lines 5 and 6, omit the following: "and the quantity of compound lard, butterine, and oleomargarine on hand."

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this bill is to provide for the collection and publication of statistics monthly concerning the quantities of cotton seed purchased by the oil mills and the stocks on hand, the quantities of seed crushed in such mills, the quantity of crude cottonseed products and refined oil products produced, the quantities of these products shipped out of the mills, and the quantities held by the mills and by refiners of cottonseed oil, by manufacturers of compound lard, butterine, oleomargarine, soap, and other users of cottonseed oil, and by brokers, exporters, warehousemen, and others handling these products. The bill has been drafted after a conference with the Director of the Census, and it is believed embodies all of the necessary directions for the purpose of securing the most complete information regarding this industry, and it is believed it will, in so far as possible, afford the opportunity of making free application of the natural law of supply and demand.

The Director of the Census estimates that for the first year or two in organizing the work an additional appropriation of possibly $10,000 will be required, and that after that the annual appropriation may be reduced considerably.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman if he knows what the expense of collecting these statistics monthly will be?

Mr. HELM. The Director estimates that for the first year or two in organizing the work an additional appropriation of possibly $10,000 will be required, and I presume that that $10,000 will be paid out at the rate of one-twelfth of that sum monthly.

Mr. MANN. I noticed that statement in the report. Is that an official statement from the Director of the Census?

Mr. HELM. Yes; so stated in the hearings had before the committee.

Mr. MANN. That is, that an additional appropriation of $10,000 will be necessary.

Mr. HELM. There is a very considerable sum appropriated annually, as the gentleman well knows, for the collection of cotton statistics, and this is additional work.

Mr. MANN. How much is that appropriation now?

Mr. HELM. I think it is in the neighborhood of $225,000.

Mr. MANN. And these statistics are collected every six months?

Mr. HELM. No; I think the statistics are collected bimonthly—that is, during the ginning season.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman mean to say that they are collected bimonthly now?

Mr. HELM. That is my information. I do not come from a cotton-producing State.

Mr. MANN. And that it will cost $10,000 more to collect them monthly?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. I thought the gentleman from Illinois, as I think the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] also thought, had reference to the collection of cotton statistics and not cottonseed statistics. It costs about $225,000 a year to collect these statistics as to cotton through the Census Bureau. The Census Bureau is not now collecting, except incidentally, any statistics as to cotton seed. The ginning reports on cotton during the ginning season are collected and published bimonthly.

Mr. MANN. It costs over $200,000 to collect the cotton statistics. Does the gentleman think that they can collect the cotton seed, cotton oil, and so forth, statistics for $10,000? I think that is a wild vagary on the part of the man who made the estimate.

Mr. LEVER. I think not, if the gentleman will permit. As the gentleman knows, practically every cottonseed oil mill has connected with it a cotton gin. The regular gin agents collect the amount of cotton at that gin and would likewise collect the amount of cotton seed coming from that gin, so that the additional expense in collecting these statistics would have to do only with the employment of probably three or four special agents who would collect statistics of cottonseed products held in refineries and manufacturing establishments, and so that the additional expense would be very small indeed. The bulk of the statistics would be collected incidentally with the collection of cotton statistics.

Mr. MANN. The bulk of the cotton seed and cottonseed oil may be incidental to the rest, but the bulk of the work will not be incidental at all, because this bill requires statistics respecting the quantities of crude cottonseed oil held by the refineries, manufacturers of compound lard, butterine, oleomargarine, soap, and other users of cottonseed oil, by brokers, exporters, warehousemen, and others handling these products. This seed manufacture covers quite a bunch of work, and the collection of these statistics of manufacture of all these people, which they will be considering as a perfect nuisance, will require a great deal of effort and, I think, a good deal of money, and I can not see myself what value it will be to collect all these statistics.

Mr. LEVER. I will say, on the contrary, to the gentleman's statement that a number of large manufacturers of cotton seed and cottonseed products and cottonseed oil through their national association, together with a large number of farmers' organizations, are requesting this information and believe it to be very valuable information as showing the entire picture of the trade.

As it is now any cotton man familiar with cottonseed business can obtain pretty good information as to the amount of cotton seed that is going to be produced if he knows the amount of cotton likely to be produced, because cotton, as we say, thirds itself in lint; in other words, the weight of cotton is one-third lint and two-thirds seed, and, knowing the weight of a bushel of cotton seed, you can fairly well approximate the amount of cottonseed oil that is going to be produced during a given year. That information is available to the other side of the picture, namely, the manufacturers' side. Now, this bill proposes to give to the producers of seed the amount of cottonseed oil held in storage and warehouses and the amount of oil to be consumed by refiners, in soap establishments, and in various lines of consumption of cottonseed oil, so that the picture will be entirely complete.

Mr. MANN. The picture is as complete to one side as to the other.

Mr. LEVER. Not at all.

Mr. MANN. Why not?

Mr. LEVER. For the reason that the manufacturer knows approximately the amount of cotton seed that is coming on the market, and the producer of cotton seed has no idea and has no statistics available as to the amount of cotton seed that will likely be consumed in the manufactured products.

Mr. MANN. But all people know just as much as one.

Mr. LEVER. I think not.

Mr. MANN. The information is available just as much to the producers of cotton seed as it is to the manufacturer of cottonseed oil. Now, it is no more to the interest of the producer than the manufacturer to know how much there may be consumed.

Mr. LEVER. That is very true, but——

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to obtaining the information as far as that is concerned, but I do not look very favorably myself upon collecting information every day and having new sets of statistics every day or every month, if they are expensive. Now, there is no more reason as to cottonseed oil and cotton seed than there is to all other productions and other lines of industry.

Mr. LEVER. I fully agree with the gentleman except this, in the matter of raw cotton and the matter of cottonseed oil, they are dealt in upon future exchanges and the market varies almost minute by minute. Now, a great many products of the farm are not listed upon the exchanges at all and therefore the manipulation in price is not so frequent.

Mr. MANN. No; but with things dealt in on the exchange where there are futures that information is equally sought for and published broadcast just as it is in reference to all grain. There is no secrecy about it, and that information is published from day to day. They do not wait entirely upon the General Government, although they are glad to have the figures submitted by the Government.

Mr. LEVER. That is very true, if the gentleman will permit, and therefore for that very reason the system of collecting agricultural statistics and making frequent publications of the information was inaugurated in this country some years ago. The gentleman will remember, many years ago, some 10 or 12, there were no statistics collected as to the production of cotton with the result that large cotton firms in Liverpool, N. Y., and New Orleans gathered their own statistics and sent them broadcast through the country with the effect either to raise the price or depress the price, mostly to depress the price.

Mr. MANN. They still gather their own statistics and publish them as soon as they get them.

Mr. LEVER. Yes; and publish them as soon as they get them.

Mr. MANN. The people as a rule give more attention to their statistics than they do to the Government's statistics.

Mr. LEVER. I disagree very emphatically with the gentleman on that proposition.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is biased in favor of the Agricultural Department.

Mr. LEVER. I am satisfied the gentleman will find upon a fuller investigation that the cotton trade to-day will take the official estimate of the Department of Agriculture as to the yield of cotton as being almost absolutely accurate. The last estimate of the Department of Agriculture as to the yield of cotton was so accurate that in a crop of 11,168,000 bales it missed it only 60,000 bales.

Mr. MANN. I think the estimate has been very accurate, and their forecasts are very accurate.

Mr. LEVER. So much so that the trade has come to look upon the statistics collected by the Government as the final umpire of the season's output.

Mr. MANN. And the gentleman proposes to duplicate that work and have the Agricultural Department make its estimate and have the Bureau of the Census collect statistics every month, when there is no substantial variation for much of the year except that regular variation which——

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman understands, of course, the Department of Agriculture at this time does not collect any statistics such as are contemplated by this bill?

Mr. MANN. Oh, they collect information all along the same line.

Mr. LEVER. But make no publication of their information in this regard.

Mr. MANN. But they collect most of the information which would be collected here now, as far as the producers of cotton seed are concerned.

Mr. LEVER. Exactly. Now, what we want to do is to get the statistics from the consumers of these products and publish them alongside of the others.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to that; but there can be no excuse given for the passage of this bill that will not apply to corn, wheat, oats, rye, barley, hogs, cattle, horses, and everything else of that sort, and there can not be many excuses given that will not apply to the main manufactured articles. And the question is whether it is necessary to commence the collection of statistics monthly at an enormous expense, and which will be of no practical value. A few years ago we had a bill up here to have a collection of agricultural statistics throughout the country reported from the committee, and to cost a million dollars, if I remember correctly. The House finally defeated the bill. I dare say there were not a hundred protests presented to all the Members of Congress for the defeat of that bill to collect agricultural statistics, although it had much in its favor in a way. I have no objection to the collection of statistics, but I think we are going a long way when we undertake to collect statistics every month from manufacturing concerns, dealers in products, as well as producers.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman will permit, let me make this suggestion to him: Under the present law we are collecting bimonthly statistics as to production of cotton during the ginning season, and also we are collecting bimonthly the amount of consumption of cotton through various manufacturing establishments. I had in mind in the introduction of this bill that the collector of information concerning raw cotton and the collector of information as to the manufactured product could in a measure do the most of this work, but I see the necessity of having four or five men who necessarily must go to the manufacturer and refiner, the soap manufacturer, and the like of that, to get information, because the other class of collectors of cotton information would not be brought in contact with that kind of an establishment.

Mr. MANN. I know we have given great consideration and favoritism to the collection of statistics relating to cotton. The gentlemen from cotton-producing regions have been of the impression that the producers of cotton were grossly discriminated against by the traders in cotton or even consumers of cotton, because the latter knew more about the production than did the producer. I have no objection to the collection of these statistics, although I think we collect cotton statistics more frequently than necessary. And I have not observed, although I do not pretend to be an expert on the subject, that it has been of any marked advantage to the producers of cotton. Information that is public, all of it, what anybody knows is public, is known to both sides. A consumer of a product in large quantity gives more study to the subject than the producer of a small quantity. Yet the producer is usually advised by his friends, by the magazines, the special papers, and sometimes by his dealer as to the situation. But we are carrying it too far. We are collecting statistics so often that people do not pay much attention to them.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman may be right, but that is not my experience of it or my own judgment about the matter. I think the statistics are very valuable and I think they have a very steadying influence upon the market, especially for products that are dealt in in futures—exchanges. Personally I would have no objection myself to the collection of additional information with reference to all agricultural products. I do not think that we can have too much information on those subjects.

Mr. MANN. These statistics may all be true. I hold in my hand a report of the Bureau of Census on the manufacture of automobiles issued not very long ago. Oh, I expect the figures are accurate, but I am frank to say I do not believe them, notwithstanding they come from the Census Bureau. I may be wrong, but I am satisfied I know enough about it to know that these figures are not correct.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman and I do not know much about automobiles, and I am not going to pass judgment on that.

Mr. MANN. I know what I see by traveling around. If we keep on we will have nothing but statistical bureaus working all over the country, collecting information in such masses that no one can digest them. We publish to-day more statistical information than anyone can handle or the whole world handle. I guarantee there are not 10 Members of this House who look at one-twentieth part of the statistical information that comes out from the Census Office which is of interest to their districts. You want to multiply it tenfold.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I want to appeal for the other fellow.

Mr. MANN. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. HILL. Five minutes.

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. HILL. I want to make an appeal for the other fellow. If any human being can tell me why a factory in Wisconsin making any of these products should be required every month to report to the United States Government the amount of stock they have on hand and the amount of all kinds of cotton products they have manufactured and turned out, he must give some reason that I can not conceive of. I read an item in the paper the other day that the Pennsylvania Railroad had to make last year 110,000 reports to somebody, and that they had to maintain a bureau for that purpose only. I know that it is extremely annoying and extremely embarrassing to many of the manufacturing interests of this country to be continually pestered with keeping books in such a way as to tell somebody else just exactly what they are doing and how they are doing it.

Now, I have not the slightest objection to accumulating statistics. I try to be something of a statistician myself, and I appreciate the value of them. But there is another bill pending in the Ways and Means Committee, a bill with regard to tobacco, looking toward this same policy. Once a month every manufacturer has, practically, to take an inventory and furnish it to somebody for somebody else's benefit. In my judgment we are going too far, gentlemen, in interfering with the private business affairs of this country for the sake and for the benefit of somebody else. I agree with the purpose of this bill in a general way. I think if this is to be done, it should be done by the Census Bureau; but it is simply a duplication, at a very large expense, of much statistical work that is already being done in a different way.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. HELM. The gentleman has had a very long and very excellent service in the House. It has been my pleasure to see him, I think, in the making up of two tariff bills, and taking a very prominent and very active interest in the framing of those bills. I do not believe that there is a Member in this House who has utilized or quoted more generously and liberally from the very statistics that the gentleman is now condemning.

Mr. HILL. I do not condemn them. I approve them.

Mr. HELM. The fact is that if the gentleman did not have the statistics that he now condemns, and which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] so severely censures, I am at a loss to know how he could have entertained the country and the House on so many different occasions and on so many different topics without this interesting information that has been the basis of every argument that he has made in the tariff discussions.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, this proposition goes a great deal further than anything that has ever been attempted before. It not only provides for the statistics of production which are now furnished by the Department of Agriculture, but it follows the whole thing through to the ultimate consumer and embraces market conditions all the way, and that is proposed to be done practically at the expense of the people of the United States. I do not mean by that at their expense in so far as they are a part of the Government, but at their expense in the way of interference with their daily work in regard to these matters in the compilation of these things.

It is easy for you to say that a man shall report once a month how much copper he has in the various forms of manufacture and how much cotton he has in the various forms of manufacture; but when you compel him to take a monthly inventory, as this does, it is embarrassing to him in the extreme.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. HILL. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for four minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. HELM. The gentleman seems to be curious—and I use the word in the sense of "anxious"—to know why it is advantageous to anyone to have tobacco statistics.

Mr. HILL. Oh, no. The gentleman misunderstands me entirely. I am not opposing this bill. I think all this information should be centered in one bureau or department, and, as I said before, I am not at all sure but that the Census Bureau is the proper place for it. But when you come to put into a bill a provision that a manufacturer of these products shall be criminally liable not only by fine but by imprisonment, also, if he fails to furnish this precise information in a certain way every month, I think it is going too far.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman again yield?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. HELM. The necessity of that provision, it seems to me, is apparent on its face. What is the use of requiring a thing to be done unless you attach a penalty for not doing it?

Mr. HILL. Exactly. I do not think it is the business of the United States Government to make all its people subject to being adjudged criminals for the sake of a market advantage accruing to some of them. It is all wrong. It is all right as the statistics are collected now, but you do not propose to eliminate those statistics that are now being collected by the Department of Agriculture on this thing. You are going to duplicate the proposition.

What I would be glad to see would be to have the gentleman's committee make a careful investigation of the statistical publications of this Government now and eliminate a whole lot of them that are absolutely unnecessary, and concentrate them all in the Census Bureau, where they properly belong. But this does not do it. This simply adds to what is being done already. I would like to see it done, but I want to see it done right, and I do not want to see the industrial people of this country criminalized on any proposition for the market advantage of some speculators, whether in corn or cotton or anything else.

Mr. HELM. The gentleman is wrong. This information is not for market speculators. As a man coming from a tobacco-growing section—and the gentleman has called in question tobacco statistics more specifically than the statistics in the case of cotton—I want to assure the gentleman that the statistics that the bureau undertakes to gather as to tobacco are not for the speculator, but they are for the protection of the grower.

Mr. HILL. Yes; I understand that.

Mr. HELM. If the gentleman's State was interested in the production of a commodity to the volume and extent that Kentucky is interested in the growing of tobacco, which is the money crop of our State——

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. HELM. Tobacco is to Kentuucky what manufacturing interests are to the gentleman's State,

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. HELM. To say that the manufacturers of America should not have statistics to show the volume and use of any particular plant would be a grave injustice to the gentleman's people, would it not, especially when it comes to the drafting or writing of tariff bills? You would be at sea without that information.

Mr. HILL. It is no injustice to anybody. It is the business of any man in business to ascertain his own facts with reference to the business he is engaged in. It is being done now. It is being done by every institution, almost, every stock exchange, and every produce exchange in the United States. They have their corps of statisticians that gather these things.

Now, this bill is not only duplicating that, but they are duplicating it in two or three of these departments here in Washington; every fact in regard to tobacco——

Mr. HELM. There is no duplication in this cotton business in different bureaus.

Mr. HILL. I think you will find that many of these statistics are gathered in the Department of Agriculture, and they are published once a month in the Crop Reporter.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Connecticut yield to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. RAGSDALE. The gentleman made the statement that all business institutions ought to gather their own facts and not to look to the Government for any of their facts.

Mr. HILL. I was speaking in a general way.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Does the gentleman contend that all the small business institutions of this country would be in a position, with their small capital and capacity, to gather their own facts, involving a vast expense?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Does the gentleman contend that the large business houses of this country would have no advantage over the small business houses if this Government did not put them in a position to know the conditions that exist? In other words, the enormous capitalization and concentration of a large number of corporations into one big body gives them such a tremendous advantage over the smaller business houses and corporations that they would be absolutely at the mercy of the big corporations if it was not for the information which in part at least they secure from the Government.

Mr. HILL. I do not agree with the gentleman at all. The large business concerns of this country have come, not by Government aid or help, but by evolution in the natural processes of business. They always will come that way, gentlemen. I was before the Federal Reserve Board the other day on an application from some banks of our State to be set off from Boston and attached to New York. I was asked this question, "Will not this tend toward the concentration of capital in New York City?" I said "No, the concentration of business in New York City tends to the concentration of capital there, and nothing that you can do, gentlemen, will interfere with it or control it," and my friend from South Carolina can not control the business of this country by any system of Government legislation or Government statistics.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the thing that I protest against most emphatically is not this proposition to have these statistics gathered monthly. I want the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] to understand that I am not opposed to his bill on its own merits. What I am opposed to is the duplication of this work. It is being duplicated. I know what the gentleman is going to say. He is going to say, "Not with reference to this"; but he knows as well as I do that propositions with reference to a dozen other crops are pending in the House of Representatives, looking to the same thing, and that is what we must face.

Mr. HELM. I am joining with the gentleman in protesting against the scattering of this work through the different departments at Washington. I agree with him that it ought to be concentrated in one department.

Mr. HILL. And I do not know of any better place to put it than the Bureau of the Census.

Mr. HELM. It either ought to have all this work or it ought to be abolished.

Mr. HILL. What I am saying in regard to this bill, gentlemen, is that for the life of me I can not imagine the necessity of subjecting the cotton mills, stretched from Virginia to Texas through the South, to the annoyance and inconvenience of being compelled practically once a month to take an inventory of their stock. And if they neglect it or refuse in its fullest details, they make themselves criminals under the terms of this bill. I object to that.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman did not hear my statement to the gentleman from Illinois a moment ago, when I said that the Cotton Seed Crushers' Association, which represents all of the cottonseed-oil mills of the country, in its last annual convention at Norfolk, Va., which convention I had the honor of addressing, adopted a resolution urgently calling upon Congress to pass this kind of legislation.

Mr. HILL. Very well. Now, let me read the last clause here, and submit it to you, as representatives of your own people, what you are proposing to do. I should like to see some legislation on this subject, but I should like to see it on a different basis than this.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HILL. Give me five minutes more.

Mr. MANN. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Thirty minutes.

Mr. MANN. I will yield to the gentleman five minutes, although I think it is up to the other side to give it to him.

Mr. HELM. The gentleman had five minutes from this side.

Mr. HILL. I do not care where the time comes from. I want to put this before you people:

> Any owner, president, treasurer, secretary, director, or other officer or agent of any manufacturing establishment, warehouse, or other place where cotton seed and cottonseed products are manufactured or stored, who, under the conditions hereinbefore stated, shall refuse or willfully neglect to furnish any of the information herein provided for or shall willfully give answers that are false shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $300 or more than $1,000 or imprisoned for a period of not exceeding one year.

I say to you gentlemen in passing that law you are liable to have every manufacturer of cotton products in the country in State prison inside of five years, if the law is enforced, and I do not believe they want to go there, and if it is not to be enforced it ought not to be passed in its present form.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. HOWARD. Is there not a law which is practically as drastic as this, which applies to the gin reports that are required to be made monthly, and which give information to the cotton factories?

Mr. HILL. I do not know.

Mr. LEVER. That is true.

Mr. HILL. I have no doubt there are a great many such calls for reports, and that is one of my objections, that this work is being duplicated. You have got to make reports to the Agricultural Department. The tobacco people have got to make reports to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and now you duplicate it all to the Chief of the Census. It ought all to be in the Bureau of the Census.

Mr. HOWARD. As a matter of fact, the Census Bureau gathers the gin reports. Now, the gentelman wants to distinguish between the manufacturers of cotton seed and the poor ginners.

Mr. HILL. Not at all. I simply want to protest against the constantly increasing system of reports, which has grown until it has finally reached the point where the manufacturers will practically have to expose his whole business once a month.

Mr. HOWARD. Then you ought to repeal the law applicable to gin reports. You ought not to make fish of one and fowl of the other.

Mr. HILL. I do not know anything about that. Ought a manufacturer in your State to be obliged to make a series of reports on the same subject to three or four different departments of the Government?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes; he ought to be compelled to do that if you make the farmers and ginners do the same thing under the same kind of a law.

Mr. HILL. Ought they to be required to make the reports to two or three different departments?

Mr. HOUSTON. Is it not a fact that the ginners make monthly reports of their output?

Mr. HILL. I do not know.

Mr. LEVER. They do make them to the officers of the Census Bureau.

Mr. HILL. I do not know.

Mr. HOUSTON. Their reports are sent in to that bureau, and this is just simply additional information to the same department; not a duplication at all.

Mr. HILL. Are not similar reports made to the Agricultural Department and published by that department?

Mr. HOUSTON. They are different, and do not cover this. This is the proper place for the report to be made. It is the place to get the report in regard to the amount ginned.

Mr. HILL. What is the necessity of duplicating it?

Mr. HOUSTON. It does not duplicate it because it is not obtained elsewhere, and is not sent to the same department. All I see that the gentleman from Connecticut objects to, is duplication, which it does not, and he objects to the penalty in it. Of course you can not have laws enforced unless there is a penalty attached to it.

Mr. HILL. If the gentleman's committee would bring in a bill covering the whole provision of reports in regard to agricultural products, and take away the duplication that now exists, I think it would be wise, but simply to add another one to the present duplication will be a great annoyance to the people of the United States.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. HELM. I think the gentleman from Connecticut is confused in his ideas.

Mr. HILL. So are the people of the country who have to make these reports.

Mr. HELM. This is the point. The gentleman complains that there is a report to be made to the Agricultural Department and one to the Bureau of Census. I do not state it as an indisputable fact, but I do state it as a conviction that the reports that the gentleman says are made to the Agricultural Department are simply estimates that are sent in by men who ride around through the locality.

Mr. HILL. I suppose that is so.

Mr. HELM. But this will be made by men appointed to do it.

Mr. HILL. Can this report be made out by a manufacturing concern without a monthly inventory?

Mr. HELM. What report?

Mr. HILL. The report that is called for in this bill.

Mr. HELM. My opinion is that it can.

Mr. HILL. I do not see how.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. These reports are all required on several things connected with the same phase of the subject?

Mr. HOUSTON. Reports are required in connection with the cotton ginning.

Mr. MADDEN. And this requires the person to add further information to his report?

Mr. HOUSTON. That is all.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has left the control of the time in my hands. I will ask the gentlemen on the other side whether they want to use any of their time?

Mr. HELM. There will be only one statement on this side, and not exceeding 10 minutes. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE].

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, the great difficulty with gentlemen in regard to this proposition is their lack of information. To start with, I can not conceive of a business enterprise that is worth the name but what would carry an inventory of stock that it has on hand at all times, because otherwise it would be unable to insure it; it would be unable to protect itself or its stockholders unless it had a comprehensive inventory of the material they had on hand, whether raw or manufactured. These inventories being kept, the objections of the gentleman from Connecticut on that score can not be sustained.

Now, I am familiar with the cottonseed industry, because it is one of the chief industries of my part of the country. The fact of the matter is that to-day not only food products come from seed, but we are largely dependent upon it for fertilizers which we can not secure from any other source.

Now, when the gentleman says that the smaller business concerns are entitled to no information from the Government, but ought to get the information as the larger concerns do, I call his attention to the absolute power that these great institutions have over the smaller producers and manufacturers.

The gentleman refers to tobacco. Why, I saw, in the summer the war broke out, the price of tobacco in 24 hours shrink from 50 to 100 per cent. One or two buyers went off the market because tliey lost connection with England. They could not get information as to what was transpiring. If it had not been for the fact that the independent buyers got certain information from the United States Government as to the crop produced, the farmers' crops would have been absolutely sacrificed, practically without competition. Then, when the gentleman comes and tells us that the Government ought not to gather and give the information into the hands of the buyers who go on the floor and give the competition that brings some protection to the producers of the raw material, it is a remarkable position for any gentleman to take on the floor of the House.

Mr. HILL. Did not the gentleman understand me to say that I did not object to it, but I thought it ought to be concentrated in one place and not duplicated?

Mr. RAGSDALE. I understood the gentleman to say specifically that this Government should not furnish the information to the small houses, that they could get the information just as well as the larger institutions, and I ask the gentleman to refer to the notes and see if he did not so state.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGSDALE. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman state why this particular information relating to cotton seed should be furnished when no such information is proposed to be gathered concerning flaxseed, corn, oats, oatmeal, and so forth?

Mr. RAGSDALE. Well, I have practically nothing to do with manufacturing flaxseed and corn. We are not a milling part of the country; we are endeavoring to protect the people that we come in daily contact with who have need of it. If the gentleman thinks the producers of the raw material in his section need protection, I recommend him to get into action and give them the relief to which they are entitled. [Laughter.]

Mr. ANDERSON. I thank the gentleman for the advice.

Mr. RAGSDALE. The gentleman is perfectly welcome to it, and I hope in the future that I shall be able to give him other good advice. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Kentucky yield me a little time?

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great interest to this discussion, and I think I am just about the average Member of Congress touching the statistical information given, and nearly the equal of the people engaged in production and trade. I listened, as I always do, with a great deal of interest to the statement made by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture. He said that the Agricultural Department kept track of the production of cotton, how many bales, and that when you know how many bales there are, you know how many tons of cotton seed there are, because there is about so much cotton seed to the bale.

Mr. LEVER. That information, however, is not available until the first Monday in December.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely; and then is when the crop is maturing. If there is not enough information gathered touching cotton and corn and wheat and all other products, then I think I will agree with the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] in saying that the gathering and compilation of it really ought to be consolidated. I am not going to vote—I think I will not—for any further statistical information until the whole matter is consolidated in one department, either the Agricultural Department or the Census. When I want some information—and when I want information I want it very much—because of my lack of industry I have to go to an expert to find out where I am to get it—at this department or that department or the other department. Life is not long enough for a man to perform his ordinary legislative duties and at the same time keep up with all these cords and cords of information that are scattered here and there—statistics in the Department of the Treasury, statistics in the State Department, statistics in the Department of Commerce, statistics in the Department of Labor, statistics in the Department of Agriculture—about kindred subjects.

Gentlemen talk about speculators as if there was something unholy in speculating. I do not know whether anyone speculates in cotton down in the cotton country or not, but I will tell you that many farmers are speculators up with us. Some of them even go on the board of trade, while others store their grain in granaries, many of them their wheat and their corn—and I guess they do it down in your country, too—saying, "Well, the crop is short and I will hold it until next year." I know farmers that have held two or three crops of corn and wheat, as the case may be. They are American citizens, intelligent people, and they have the right to speculate if they want to.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman did not understand me as condemning speculation. My record on that proposition here in legislation is too well known. I regard legitimate speculation as the life of trade.

Mr. CANNON. Everybody speculates, the retailer, the wholesaler, and the consumer, to a greater or less extent. I even know people who speculate in cold-storage apples, and all that kind of thing.

Mr. LEVER. And chewing gum.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; perhaps in chewing gum also. I believe in full information, reliable information. I have no objection to the Government collecting statistics—in fact, I favor the Government keeping general track of production, but I quite agree with what the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] has said, at least in part, touching the great number of channels to which one has to go to get information, and sometimes then that information conflicts; many times it does. We legislate and legislate and legislate and provide for fines to be levied upon people, right and left, for imprisonment in some cases, and unless we stop before a great while we will arrive at a point where every producer, every retailer, every jobber, every manufacturer and speculator, even, in order to proceed with safety will have to hire a lawyer, and a very good one at that, to keep him from subjecting himself to a fine or imprisonment.

Mr. Chairman, I am a conservationist. I am tired of seeing the forests of this country cut down and converted into print paper on which to print many of the newspapers and magazines and the recollections of people and statistics and reports here and there; we have got to stop it or the country will be deprived of its forests. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I do not see what all this drift into commercial relations and things of that sort means. It seems to me this is a very innocent proposition that is pending. I come from a State that ordinarily produces about one-fourth of the cotton of the United States, and it is a fact that the Government takes censorship over the entire marketing, ginning, direction, and control of the cotton, and the world takes a censorship of how much is planted, and the appearance of a little worm in the cotton patch is telegraphed across the ocean, and a little fly that lights in the cotton patch about sundown is held up and headlined as an alarming thing, like yellow fever would be, or some other distress. The world takes cognizance of it. The cotton farmer and the cotton crushers and the people who produce and market and direct these affairs simply want to keep trace of the seed, that they may be able to protect themselves and yet at the same time know intelligently what is being done with the great cottonseed crop, for every bale of cotton is only one-third of what the seed is. In other words, every cotton crop is made up of about one-third of cotton and two-thirds of seed. I do not see any reason for raising any row about it. It is already a governmental process, until the seed is taken from the cotton, and the ginner that separates the seed from the cotton has to make his report, and it is under the control and direction of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HELM. I wish the gentleman on the other side would use some time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, we are going pretty far when we require every storekeeper who has in his possession some cottonseed products to make report to the National Government monthly, and on failure to make that report punish him by a fine of not less than $300. That is what this bill does. I am in entire sympathy with the policy of gathering statistics of agricultural products, and favored in the subcommittee in the preparation of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act legislation which permitted quarterly collection of statistics so far as the tobacco crop was concerned, but when you, by this character of legislation, attempt to compel every storekeeper, every holder of cottonseed products, to make return once a month for the benefit of some producer of cottonseed oil, I say you are going quite far, indeed. If you are going to justify that policy as far as this bill is concerned, then you will necessarily have to go consistently in favor of gathering statistics as to the quantity of cold-storage eggs in the warehouses and of all kinds of cold-storage products monthly. The iron and steel manufacturers would have the same right; the steel foundryman to ask for statistics as to the production of pig iron. The manufacturer of textile goods could ask for a census return monthly as to the amount of dyestuffs, or the amount of cotton, or the amount of wool. In fact, you can not conceive of any limit carried to a logical extreme to which this bill would not carry us if we are going to follow this as a standard.

I am opposed to that character of sumptuary legislation requiring a private individual to furnish information at his own expense for the benefit of some other private individual. It is one thing for the Government to gather statistics and provide for the appointment of agents to gather those statistics, and that is what we do so far as the cotton crop is concerned and the tobacco crop is concerned. As to the cotton crop, we employ something like 780 officials—local agents—for gathering those statistics, but here it is intended not only to utilize these local agents who are engaged in the gathering of cotton statistics, but you are going to compel, under a mandate of the Director of the Census, every storekeeper and every warehouseman to report monthly the quantity of cottonseed-oil products he has on hand. I direct the attention of the committee to this phraseology as found in the third section of the bill:

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of every owner, president, treasurer, secretary, director, or other officer or agent of any cottonseed-oil mill, manufacturing establishment, warehouse, or other place where cottonseed products are produced, manufactured, or stored, whether conducted as a corporation, firm, limited partnership, or by individuals, when requested by the Director of the Census or by any special agent or other employee of the Bureau of the Census acting under the instructions of said director, to furnish completely and correctly, to the best of his knowledge, all of the information concerning the quantity of cotton seed received—

And so forth.

And later on there is a provision which authorizes the Director of the Census to obtain that information by registered mail, and the receipt of the registered card is evidence that the storekeeper has received the demand, and upon the failure of that storekeeper to furnish the information he is then punished by a fine of not less than $300. That is unwarranted legislation, when you seek to impose that——

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. In a minute—to impose that requirement upon every character of business man in this country who happens to have some stores of cottonseed products in his possession. Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HELM. Does the gentleman know—and if so, will he tell the House—what is the value of the annual crop of cotton?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have examined the report, but I have not that information.

Mr. HELM. I am asking about the value of the entire cotton crop each year.

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman to furnish that information.

Mr. HELM. I asked the gentleman—the gentleman is talking about a thing of which he purports to have a good deal of information——

Mr. STAFFORD. I have not made such a claim. I am criticizing the bill, although I have read the report; but if the gentleman will answer the question, I will yield to him; if he will not, I will decline to yield further.

Mr. HELM. I would like to ask the gentleman——

Mr. STAFFORD. I have yielded to the gentleman to answer the question propounded by him. If he does not answer, I will decline to yield further.

Mr. HELM. I do not profess to have that information——

Mr. STAFFORD. I acknowledge I have not the information.

Mr. HELM. But I do know that in the volume of the trade of the United States cotton is larger than any other one product of the United States.

Mr. STAFFORD. I yielded to the gentleman to give the information to the House. Can the gentleman give the information to the House as to the potato crop or the wheat crop or the corn crop? I can approximate, but I do not profess to be a statistician as to the facts in the possession of the Census Bureau. If the gentleman will yield me time, I will be glad to yield further; he has plenty of time——

Mr. HELM. I will yield the gentleman a minute.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will yield me five minutes, I will be glad——

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELM. One minute.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has consumed that minute.

Mr. HELM. I will yield the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Make it five.

Mr. HELM. Since the publication of these statistics on cotton, as well as the other farm products, is it not true that it has tended to stabilize the market value of all of these products where there has been a publication of the information such as contained in this bill, both in regard to cotton and tobacco especially?

Mr. STAFFORD. I think the gentleman has taken up my two minutes, and I think it is only fair he should yield me three more.

Mr. HELM. The gentleman is a clever beggar, I admit. If the gentleman will undertake some information along that line——

Mr. STAFFORD. I shall not beg to answer the question. If the gentleman had paid attention to my prefatory statement, he would have known that I was in favor of gathering statistics and that this year I favored the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] to gather quarterly tobacco statistics, but those statistics were to be gathered by the agents of the Government connected with the Census Bureau.

But here you are seeking to impose upon the private individual who happens to have in his possession a small quantity of cottonseed products, or maybe a large quantity, upon receiving a registered mail demand from the Director of the Census, the making of a complete report of an inventory as to his stock of these products. And for the benefit of whom? For the benefit of some private individual, not for his own benefit. If the Government wishes that information, then they should perform that work by their own delegated agents and not impose it upon some outside agency.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LEVER. I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not know that the penal provisions of this bill are exactly like the penal provisions——

Mr. STAFFORD. I have compared it with the present law, of which it is almost an identical copy, but there is this distinction in the two cases. In the original proposition you are calling upon the man who is directly interested, the cotton producer, for the information. Here you are calling upon an outsider who is not directly interested in this information. He may be, but the chances are he will not be. If you can justify this process on the part of a private individual in regard to cottonseed oil, then you can justify it as to every character of production in the country. And I say we are going too far when we do that. Under the present practice of collecting cotton statistics the report says that much of this information is obtained under the authority of the act the gentleman referred to, the statistics being collected incidentally. Then, what is the purpose of requiring all these men who happen to have stores of these cottonseed products to make their monthly returns just for the benefit of the individual producer? If the Government wants that information for the benefit of the country, let them employ agents to obtain it, but not force upon the private individual a work that is necessarily a governmental function.

I am opposed to this bill because it spells a precedent that will ultimately cost, if carried out to a logical extreme, the expenditure of a million dollars. If we would extend it to all products it would cost $10,000,000. We are already expending several hundred thousand dollars for cotton statistics, and several thousand for tobacco statistics, and if statistics are to be gathered as to all the products of this great country, it would mean an expenditure annually of millions upon millions of dollars. And I do not think we are warranted in going to that extreme.

Mr. QUIN. This report says it only costs $10,000 the first year, and that it will be reduced the next year.

Mr. STAFFORD. Anyone who has had experience here knows that appropriations grow and grow. I have served on the committee that considers this legislation, and I have seen these things grow from thousands up to millions. That is merely begging the question. If the full information is going to be collected, it is going to cost in a few years hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Twelve minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN].

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin has stated what he believes to be some of the objectionable features of this bill. My idea is that legislation of this kind ought not to be enacted relating to one crop or one product or one industry alone. There are other productions almost, if not quite, as valuable or important as cotton or cotton seed, and if we are going to embark in the work of gathering statistics in relation to cotton and the supply of cotton products all over this country, and the use and consumption of these products, there will be no reason for not taking up the same kind of work respecting other products.

And I wish to say that my limited experience in this House shows that money is appropriated by Congress in one way and another for the benefit of and in relation to cotton and cotton products more abundantly, I believe, than for any other single product, and very much more than for several of the large products together. As a member of the Committee on Agriculture, I have some knowledge of appropriations made with respect to cotton, and the bill is full every year of appropriations of money for work of one kind and another in relation to cotton, and, it seems to me, preferring this product to all others in an improper manner and to an improper extent, and calling upon the Federal Government to do in manifold ways work that the producers of cotton, those particularly in the first instance interested in it, ought to do for themselves.

It seems to me that the legislation along this line is not wise. It is not proper. If statistics are to be gathered for cotton seed and cottonseed oil, they should be gathered in relation to other products as well. One product ought not to be singled out and favored in this way. And I believe, with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], that, although the beginning of this work may involve a small outlay, it will grow necessarily and the provisions of this bill will require work of such a character and of such an extent that the expenditure will ultimately reach large figures. And the House must not be deceived by statements in the report or otherwise made that the expenditure will be only $10,000 a year. I believe also, with the gentleman from Wisconsin, that the requirement of manufacturers and dealers all over the country, large and small, that they make monthly reports is an improper and unjust requirement, and particularly the penalty is unjust. Anyone failing to make prompt report each month, anyone refusing to make reports called for, is liable to a fine of not less than $300.

If a measure of this kind is to be enacted, if cotton is again to be singled out for preference over and above every other agricultural product of the country, this bill must be materially amended. In my judgment, until the bill is amended in such a way as to include some other products, it ought not to be enacted; but if there are votes enough here now to enact it, or something of the kind, it ought to be materially amended in the respect mentioned by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON] has requested some time, and I would like to yield five minutes to him.

Mr. STAFFORD. That will be entirely acceptable.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, so far as other products are concerned, the merits of this bill do not depend upon whether there are furnished statistics of other products or not. Each one must rest on its own merits, and I have no doubt that very valuable and profitable information could be furnished by having statistics in regard to other products, such as grain, and so forth. But I come to the proposition to which I wish to call attention. It has been submitted by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] and by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that they object to this bill because it creates duplication of service; that it does not concentrate the work. I want to call their attention to this fact: They admit that the proper department to collect this information is the Census Bureau. Now, then, the Census Bureau is already collecting information in regard to the cotton ginned—semimonthly, in fact. The same gentlemen and the same agencies can collect this information about the same product, of course. Now, it is not a duplication here, but it is an accumulation of information from the same source in the hands of the same department of the Government.

I admit that it would be very well to have a general system to collect all this information and let it depend upon one department of the Government to collect that information. This is a step in that direction, because we are accumulating it upon the department that is properly qualified and suited to do this work.

Mr. HILL. I am entirely in accord with the view that the gentleman presents, and I would cheerfully vote to concentrate this whole work in the Bureau of the Census; but I supplement that statement by asking the gentleman whether he believes it to be right to criminalize a man who happens to have a portion of the products of this kind, whether merchants or otherwise—and I have no objection to cotton; I would be glad that you should have what you want—but is it fair to criminalize perhaps 500,000 people in the United States if they do not comply with these peremptory orders once a month?

Mr. HOUSTON. I admit the force of the contention for gathering all of this information in one department and under one central head, and I admit that there is a good deal to be gathered that is not provided for by law, and I would favor a provision providing that it should all be gathered. But here is an industry that is perhaps the most important in the country. We are at work in the business of getting information with reference to that great product. We are getting a part of it from the Bureau of the Census. We are proposing to get more by the same agency, to get additional information. That is not duplication; it is concentration. So long as we are proceeding on that line, we are obviating the trouble the gentleman speaks of.

Now, as to the matter of penalty, penalizing men who do not make the reports, the law requiring reports as to the amount of cotton ginned imposes the same penalty, and the same is done in the case of tobacco. That has a penal clause in it. You can not enforce a law of this kind and compel people to make answer without imposing a penalty. If they refuse to answer, or make a false answer, a penalty must be imposed.

Now, as to the question of a $300 minimum fine, I think that is wrong, and as a member of the committee, with the authority of other members of the committee and the chairman thereof, I have prepared an amendment to strike out the minimum penalty altogether.

Mr. HILL. Strike out the imprisonment clause also.

Mr. HOUSTON. Perhaps it would be well to consider that. I do not know but that I will agree to that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will not the gentleman eliminate the penalty entirely, so as to make it voluntary on the part of the owner to make the returns, if he thinks fit?

Mr. HOUSTON. No; it would be useless to attempt this unless you compel them to comply with the law.

Mr. HILL. Does not the gentleman bear in mind the fact that every warehouse in the United States and every grocery and grocery store has to make this report once a month?

Mr. HOUSTON. You will notice that the bill provides that it must be done upon the request of the Director of the Census.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOUSTON. May I have two minutes more?

Mr. HELM. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. HOUSTON. He is going to make that request of the man who is prepared to give that information. Of course you do not want to include all the other parties. I would be in favor of striking that out.

Mr. HILL. I would be glad if you would do that.

Mr. HOUSTON. I shall offer an amendment to strike out the minimum penalty.

Mr. HILL. And the imprisonment clause.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to the penalty, but does the gentleman think that any of these penalties will ever stand if tested, as to our right to require people to furnish this information through the Bureau of the Census?

Mr. HOUSTON. I am not prepared to answer, but I should think that it would be very persuasive.

Mr. MANN. It plainly does not come within the provisions of the Constitution as to the taking of the census.

Mr. HELM. There has been no instance, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, where any one has refused to give the information that has been asked of him.

Mr. MANN. The question is whether the penalty is sufficiently severe to make them give a return——

Mr. HELM. Persuasive enough?

Mr. MANN. If they make it harsh enough for somebody to test it, I doubt if it would go.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] is recognized.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I agree in large part with the statement made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN]. I do not know that I can add anything to what he said in a general way. I have no objection to the gathering of information, but it does seem to me that what we spend for the gathering of information ought to be spent equitably with reference to the different products of the country.

I have taken the trouble to get copies of the reports that are now made by the Census Bureau on cotton. I have here three different reports, one of which is made semimonthly and two of which are made monthly. One of them calls for information on the cotton consumed in the country, the cotton produced in the country, the cotton on hand, and the number of spindles, and the number of consuming establishments, and information of that character. Another one of these reports is a report on cotton ginning. There is another report on cotton seed crushed and linters obtained.

Those reports are issued either monthly or semimonthly. In addition, the Bureau of the Census sends out monthly a statement, which is posted up in the post offices of practically all the cotton-producing States. Last year, in addition, the Census Bureau got out a bulletin, No. 131, on cotton production and distribution in the United States, a very comprehensive bulletin. There are sent out reports on cotton aggregating a million copies annually—four times as many reports as on all the other subjects put together.

Those reports on cotton cost the Government $256,000—almost half as much as the cost of taking the census of manufactures last year, and practically as much as was expended on everything else except the taking of the manufactures census.

But the appropriations for cotton do not end there. In addition, we are gathering a vast amount of information through the Department of Agriculture and expending a great deal of money for investigating and reporting upon various things relating to cotton. For instance, we are spending some $56,000 a year in investigating the diseases of cotton. We are spending $37,000 in developing cultural methods relative to cotton. We are spending $59,000 for the investigation of the southern field crops, including cotton. We are spending $54,480 in determining the tensile strength of cotton fiber and determining the standards of cotton fiber. We are spending the sum of $150,000, approximately, in the enforcement of the cotton-futures act. We are spending $660,000 annually in the suppression of the cotton-boll weevil, or at least in the development of cotton cultural methods which will diminish and minimize the ravages of the cotton-boll weevil.

In addition, we are spending in the Census Bureau, as I have said, some $256,000 a year. Now, it seems to me it would be eminently fair for us to go a little bit slowly with cotton and to commence upon something else, if we are in need of information as to agricultural products. I think cotton is getting all that is coming to it and a good deal more, and it is time for us to go slowly on this cotton proposition. That is all I have to say about this subject.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. STAFFORD. How much time has the gentleman yielded back?

The CHAIRMAN. Two minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield those two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I do not favor this bill because of the restrictions it places upon men in business. The tendency in matters of legislation has come to be more and more burdensome to men who are undertaking to do things in this country. I would like to vote for anything that would encourage the cotton planters, but I realize that there is much special legislation in their behalf, so much that at times even the cotton planter himself revolts against it. Some time ago we passed through this House a cotton-futures bill; we are now receiving protests from the cotton planters of Louisiana and other States against certain provisions of that cotton-futures bill. Congress is burdening the men who are trying to do the business of the country.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman will permit, I will say that most of those protests against the cotton-futures bill originated in Philadelphia. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have some of them in my hand here from Louisiana and Alabama; and I understand that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] and other southern gentlemen have received copies of these resolutions passed by associations in their own States complaining of the burdensome, if not meddlesome, legislation that is passed, presumably in their behalf. I shall read one resolution from the Alabama association:

Resolved also, That the farmers of the South claim the right to dispose of their cotton either by future contract or otherwise, as they may deem proper and that they claim the right to buy or sell legitimate or legal future contracts at home or abroad whenever or wherever they may consider their best interests demands; further, that they are opposed to any law or laws that may in any manner restrict them in the free exercise of their judgment in reference to the handling of their business.

Mr. LEVER. Does the gentleman believe any farmer had anything to do with that resolution?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No business man anywhere could make a stronger appeal to Congress to let him alone than is made by these cotton men of the South. I have been reading from resolutions purporting to come from farmers' organizations in Alabama, Louisiana, Florida, Texas, and other States—the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America they are called.

Mr. HELM. I yield my remaining time to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER].

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I shall take only a few moments' time, because this bill has been discussed rather freely and is fairly well understood. In answer to the criticism that this bill is aimed to promote the cotton industry, I wish to say that I do not feel that the criticism is justified. It seems to me that the time has come in this country when men ought to regard legislation without reference to the section of the country involved in it. I believe that I speak the feeling of two-thirds of the Members of Congress on the other side of this aisle when I make that statement.

Gentlemen seem to forget that while cotton in its total value is not so large a product as wheat, it is in its export value the largest crop in this country. I assert it as a fact which can not be denied that cotton produces 28 to 30 per cent of the export trade of the United States to-day and preserves absolutely the balance of trade in favor of this country in its international trade relationships.

But this bill is not intended to help the producer of cotton alone. It was not introduced at the request of the cotton producer alone. I will say very frankly that this bill had its origin largely in the minds of the cotton oil mill companies of the South, the men who get the seed directly from the farmer, crush the seed in their mills, and sell their product to the manufacturers and refiners of the oil.

As I said a moment ago, the Cottonseed Crushers Association of the South at its annual convention has twice requested Congress to enact legislation of this kind, not in the interest of the producer alone, but in the interest of complete information for the entire cottonseed business of the country, including the raw material and the finished product.

Now the Census Bureau, in the gathering of its cotton statistics, incidentally collects information as to the amount of cotton seed produced each year, and that information is available. The argument for this bill is that the information as to the raw material being available to the consumer of the raw material, the producer of the raw material ought to have equal information as to the consumption of that which he produces, in order to put him on an equal trade footing with the people to whom he sells. That is all there is in this bill, and it affects equally the manufacturer, the refiner, the producer, and the cotton oil mill people.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does not the gentleman think that the greatest menace to the cotton industry to-day is the almost total failure of dyes with which to dye the goods into which cotton goes.

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that I have a very keen appreciation of that situation, and I hope that we may be able to put machinery in motion that will develop the dye industry in this country. In the Agricultural appropriation bill we have provided a $50,000 appropriation for the study of that situation. I do not know what it will develop, but the committee felt that we could very well afford to spend money in experimenting along those lines.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. LEVER. I will yield first to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. I always listen with more than usual interest to what the gentleman says, and I listened to his statement that the cotton exportations are proportionately very large. I am wondering whether there should not be some plan by which most of that raw material may be manufactured in our own country rather than shipped abroad.

Mr. LEVER. I wish very much that such a plan could be developed, but so far it has not been, although the gentleman knows that the cotton-manufacturing industry of this country has developed wonderfully in the last 25 years.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Bearing on the dyestuffs question, the gentleman states that the Agricultural Committee is now considering that matter?

Mr. LEVER. The Agricultural appropriation bill now on the calendar carries an item of $50,000 for the investigation of means and methods of getting dyestuffs for this country.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is aware of the fact that the Ways and Means Committee has the same subject under consideration, and that it was attempted to be brought up here the other day in the Army bill? As bearing upon this question of the passage of more laws than the country apparently needs and so creating a confusion of laws, I ask the gentleman whether having this matter come before the House in three different ways, from three different committees, does not tend rather to interfere with the progress of business than to accelerate it?

Mr. LEVER. No; I do not think so at all for the reason that the bill reported from the Ways and Means Committee will deal with one phase of it, while the agricultural bill will deal with an entirely different phase of the subject. And the Bureau of Standards deals with another.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It may be helpful, but does not the gentleman think that in the confusion of interests it may lead to more trouble than it will help?

Mr. LEVER. I would think not in that case, but that is aside from the question. As I was saying, Mr. Chairman, this bill only proposes that in playing this game with the cotton seed and its products the cards shall be laid face up on top of the table, and that the entire trade may have the benefit of such information as may be made available under the terms of the bill. Now, the cost is practically nothing. The testimony of Mr. Steuart, representing the Bureau of the Census, before the Committee on the Census was to this effect:

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Steuart, we will be glad to have you elaborate the provisions of the bill in your own way.

Mr. STEUART. Mr. Chairman, the Census Bureau collects statistics in regard to the quantity of cotton seed crushed, but we have no authority of law to do the work which is provided for in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. You get this information now?

Mr. STEUART. No; we collect statistics of the quantity of cotton seed crushed, incidental to the collection of statistics of the quantity of cotton in the country. We do that because the linters form a part of the cotton crop, and we have put on the schedule sent to the oil mills an inquiry in regard to the quantity of seed from which the linters are obtained, to get that information, and also for the purpose of checking the quantity of linters reported by the mills. Therefore the enforcement of the provisions of Mr. LEVER'S bill can be had by an enlargement of the inquiries we make now of the cottonseed-oil mills.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the estimated increased cost of that?

Mr. STEUART. I estimated it to be between $10,000 and $15,000 to begin that work. I do not believe it will cost all of that.

Then he goes on to state that on account of the fact that practically every cotton-oil mill concern in the South has a cotton gin attached from which cotton statistics are collected, the agent who collects these figures would only have to supplement his work by collecting these figures of the amount of seed at that mill.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KEARNS. I have not been upon the floor during all of this discussion, and possibly the question that I am about to ask has been answered by yourself or others. If the bill should become a law, how would it help the producer of cotton? How would it benefit him in any way?

Mr. LEVER. I tried to explain it a moment ago, but I will repeat it for the gentleman's benefit. The situation now is that the consumers of cotton seed know approximately the amount of cotton seed that is produced from time to time, and therefore they have the advantage of those who do not know. The cotton producer does not have that information. It can not be available during the selling season as to the amount of cotton seed being consumed by the various manufacturers into manufactured products. Therefore the farmer is at a disadvantage in relation to the consumer.

Mr. KEARNS. If the planter had the information he could get better prices; is that the gentleman's idea?

Mr. LEVER. My idea is that he would not only get better prices but that it would have the effect of stabilizing the prices of cotton seed and cottonseed products, and that is the object of this bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I was saying when interrupted that the expense of the gathering of this information is negligible. It is stated to be $10,000 a year to get the information involving a product the annual value of which is in the neighborhood of $325,000,000.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman permit me an interruption?

Mr. LEVER. Certainly.

Mr. HOUSTON. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics stated at first that it would cost $10,000 a year, but after that it would be very much less.

Mr. LEVER. That is true, and I am glad the gentleman called my attention to it. The additional expense involved in this bill will mean the employment of probably two or three traveling agents for the Bureau of the Census, and providing for their salaries and their traveling expenses. I can see no reason why the expense should be beyond that.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. LEVER. Certainly.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. This bill calls for reports from the manufacturers of compound lard, soap, and oleomargarine. We are getting no reports at present from those manufacturers.

Mr. LEVER. None whatever.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. So this bill would require a larger number of inspectors to go to these various places to get the information. It seems to me it would require considerable more expense than the gentleman has stated.

Mr. LEVER. The practical working of this bill would be this: The Director of the Census, as he does now, would send out his cards to these manufacturers asking for this information. The probability is that without any reluctance whatever the information would be furnished. The only other expense connected with it would be probably two or three or four traveling inspectors to see if the information was being correctly given.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Is there any reason why the information should not be obtained from the manufacturers; that you could get the information from the producers of the raw oil and then the producers of the refined oil; and is not that the information that you seek?

Mr. LEVER. Well, it is a kind of endless-chain proposition. For instance, the cottonseed crusher in the field is interested to know how much oil the refiner has on hand; the refiner is interested to know how much the oleo manufacturers use in the way of oil; so the information is interesting to the entire line, from the farmer up to the final consumer. Does the gentleman catch that point?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I catch the point, but I think it would cost nearer $100,000.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Upon what does the gentleman base his opinion that it will only cost $10,000?

Mr. LEVER. On the statement of the gentleman in charge of the gathering of like information.

Mr. WALSH. Upon what does that gentleman base his opinion?

Mr. LEVER. On an experience of 10 or 15 years in doing this kind of work.

Mr. WALSH. Collecting these statistics?

Mr. LEVER. Collecting agricultural statistics and gathering reports in connection with the ginning of cotton, from time to time.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. I will.

Mr. ANDERSON. The $10,000 is in addition to the ordinary appropriation for the Census Bureau for gathering cotton statistics?

Mr. LEVER. I so understand.

Mr. ANDERSON. So, as a matter of fact, this would be chargeable to the gathering of these cotton statistics, and be so much in excess of the amount we now appropriate?

Mr. LEVER. The total amount of appropriations for the gathering of cotton statistics by the Census Bureau, as I recollect the figures, is $225,000 a year, and this would add $10,000 to that. That is the testimony before the Committee on the Census, as I recall it.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. There are 100,000,000 people in the United States and a good many outside of the United States who consume these products. Of what avail are statistics unless you can know all that the jobbers have on hand, all that the retailers have on hand, all that the families have on hand, including the bakers and everyone else, because if they are liberally supplied that would tend to affect the price.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, the answer to that would be this: If I know to-day that an oleomargarine concern has on hand so many barrels of refined cottonseed oil, and my next report shows that they have on hand only half that much, I know that that much of material has gone into trade somewhere, and therefore it is accounted for in that way.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. HILL. To-day is the 29th of March, and we have not yet found out just one aggregate figure of the amount of importations or exports to and from this country in the month of February—not the details, but just the aggregate. Does the gentleman believe that it is possible to gather these statistics once a month and have them really valuable after he has them? That is a question that puzzles me a good deal.

Mr. LEVER. My answer to that question is based on my experience with the Census Bureau in gathering statistics as to cotton. During the ginning season only, which begins about the 15th of September and runs to the middle of January or a little later in some cases, the Census Bureau collects bimonthly figures of the amount of cotton ginned throughout the South. Those figures are collated, compiled, and published on fixed days during the month, so that with reference to that situation it is entirely possible to get that kind of accurate information and give it out to the country very rapidly and readily. That is true, likewise, of the growing condition of the cotton crop during the year. The Agricultural Department reports, I think, monthly, and their reports are considered valuable and considered very accurate, likewise.

Mr. HILL. They are estimates.

Mr. LEVER. They are estimates only. The only other point to which I desire to call the attention of the committee is the matter of the penal provisions of the bill. I am perfectly willing, so far as I am concerned, to strike out the minimum fine fixed in this bill, and I am likewise perfectly willing to strike out the imprisonment feature of the bill as it occurs in both sections. My friend from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON] informs me that he has an amendment prepared for that purpose. But I may say that these two provisions, these penal provisions, follow verbatim what is already in the law, and therefore they appear in this bill. There is one other amendment called to my attention by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PARK], which would occur on line 3 of the bill, page 2. After the word "warehousemen" there is a comma and the words "and others handling these products," and that language might be construed to permit the gathering of statistics as to the amount of soap or the like being held in a little country store. There was, of course, no such intention, and that language was intended to apply to the words just immedaitely preceding, namely, "brokers, exporters, and warehousemen." I think that difficulty can be cured by inserting after the word "exporters" the word "and" and striking out the comma after the word "warehousemen" and the words "and others" and by inserting in lieu thereof the words "engaged in handling these products," so that it would read "and by brokers, exporters, and warehousemen engaged in handling these products." I think that would confine it to these three classes of people. With these amendments, it seems to me, there can be no possible objection to this bill except upon the theory that probably we are going too far in the gathering of information. As far as I am personally concerned, I am willing to join with my friends from the West in gathering all the statistics that we think it wise to gather, so that the country may have the knowledge. I do not believe that manufacturers, farmers, producers, and business men in this enlightened age are going ever to object to the gathering of legitimate information and the turning on of legitimate light, and that is all that this proposes to do.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I understood the gentleman to say that he favored striking out the minimum fine and the imprisonment clause in both sections?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I should think in section 2 that ought to remain. That is a breach of trust by an employee of the Census Bureau.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman is entirely correct about that. I had the other in mind. I trust, therefore, that the bill may pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Director of the Census be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to collect and publish monthly statistics concerning the quantity of cotton seed received at oil mills, the quantity of seed crushed in such mills, the quantity of crude cottonseed products obtained, the quantities of these crude products sold and shipped out of the mills and the quantities on hand, the quantities of crude cottonseed oil held by refiners, by manufacturers of compound lard, butterine, oleomargarine, soap, and other users of cottonseed oil, and by brokers, exporters, warehousemen, and others handling these products, the quantity of compound lard, soap, butterine, and oleomargarine made, shipped, or held by manufacturers of these products either at the factory or elsewhere, and the quantity of cotton seed and cottonseed products imported and exported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 7, strike out the word "obtained" and insert the words "and refined oil produced."

Page 1, line 8, strike out the word "crude" and the words "sold and."

Page 1, lines 9 and 10, after the word "quantities," insert the words "of these products and of cotton seed."

Page 2, line 4, after the word "products," strike out the words "the quantity of compound lard, soap, butterine, and oleomargarine made, shipped, or held by manufacturers of these products either at the factory or elsewhere."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 2, after the word "soap," strike out the remainder of the line, being the words "and other users of cottonseed oil."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does that mean to strike out only the words "and other users of cottonseed oil"?

Mr. HOUSTON. That is all to that amendment; I have some more amendments to follow that.

Mr. MANN. You want to insert the word "and" before the word "soap."

Mr. HOUSTON. That is correct. I ask unanimous consent that the word "and" be inserted before the word "soap" in line 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modified amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 2, after the word "oleomargarine," insert the word "and," and after the word "soap" strike out the words "and other users of cottonseed oil."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be modified in accordance with the gentleman's request.

There was no objection.

The question was taken, and the amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. Now, Mr. Chairman, on page 2, line 3, after the word "exporters," insert the word "and," then, after the word "warehouseman," strike out the words "and others" and substitute the words "engaged in."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 3, after the word "exporters," insert the word "and," and, after the word "warehouseman," strike out the words "and others" and insert in lieu thereof the words "engaged in."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "publish," strike out the word "monthly" and insert the word "quarterly."

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, can we have that amendment again reported? There is so much confusion.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman will allow me to make this statement to him, the ginning of cotton throughout the cotton belt begins usually from about the 1st to the 15th of September, and it runs until about the 15th of January, though there will be scattering ginning after that time, but the bulk of the cotton crop is ginned by the 1st of December.

Now, the value of this bill, if it is going to be of value, is going to come from the fact that this information is going to be available during the time when the farmer is ginning his cotton and selling his cotton seed. Now, if you make these reports public quarterly it will probably destroy the effect of the bill, and I think when the gentleman understands the situation he will see why it is necessary to publish the reports monthly.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. During what month does it commence, and when does it end?

Mr. LEVER. The ginning will begin about the 15th of September and it will end about the 15th of January, but the bulk of the ginning will cease about the 1st of December each year; that is, from the 15th of September to the 1st of December.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. What is the purpose of having these reports made monthly after the 1st of January until the 1st of September? It seems to me that is a useless expense from the gentleman's own statement.

Mr. LEVER. I think there is something in the gentleman's suggestion, except there is this in the proposition, that some of these statistics will be of value to others than the producers, for instance, the gathering of figures concerning the amount of oil held in various kinds of manufacturing establishments, oleomargarine factories, refining establishments, and so forth.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. In other words, it will be of slight value during the balance of the year?

Mr. LEVER. It will not be of any special value to the producer of cotton seed, after he has sold it, during the balance of the year.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I wish to say to the gentleman from South Carolina I do not want to destroy the bill by inserting an amendment that will have that effect——

Mr. LEVER. I am sure of that.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. But I do believe it is unnecessary to gather statistics of any crop during every month of the year. As the gentleman from South Carolina knows so much about the production of cotton, I wish he would offer an amendment that would do away with useless work that is required under the present bill.

Mr. LEVER. I do not think I would be willing to say that the gathering of these monthly statistics after the 1st of January would be entirely useless. They would not be as important to the producer as the gathering of them monthly during the preceding months of January, November, October, and September; but I would rather not accept an amendment of that kind, because the gathering of the figures after the 1st of January will be a comparatively little matter, and the cost will be small, and it would destroy the symmetry of my proposition and make the reports less valuable.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. The real complaint that has been offered to this bill that meets favor with me is the fact that it imposes upon the manufacturer and the warehouseman and every man who touches this cotton the necessity of making a monthly report. This is not going to be such a great burden upon the Government as upon the trade, and it seems to me it is an unnecessary burden from the gentleman's own statement.

Mr. LEVER. I would think, in reply to that question, that the burden spoken of will be infinitesimal. I should think they could make up these figures for return to the Census Bureau from their books in 15 minutes during the course of a day, and the manufacturer wants this information.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. If the gentleman will bear with me, these statistics are distributed all through the country?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. They are burdening our mails, and if they are not absolutely necessary, let us not have them.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman will see my position is this, that I am more interested in gathering these statistics from the standpoint of the man who produces cotton than the man who manufactures the cotton seed into various products, but I want to be fair in the matter, and the gathering of these figures after the 1st of January, I would imagine, would be of a great deal more benefit to the manufacturing end of the business than to the producing end of the business, and I feel the manufacturer ought to have an equal show with the information which we collect under this bill. I hope the amendment may be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes longer. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman indicated that he was in sympathy with the suggestion made by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] of having monthly statistics from September to January, and quarterly thereafter. I wish to ask him whether he would object to withdrawing his amendment, so as to provide for monthly statistics from September to January in each year and quarterly statistics during the remainder of the year?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I have no objection to that.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me, what is the use of that? Now, as I understand it, nobody is asking for this legislation except the cotton producer.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman is mistaken, if he will permit. The cottonseed crushers are asking for this information.

Mr. CANNON. Well, that happens inside of four months, and after that, if there is anybody interested, it is this special army of officers that would be required to gather the great amount of statistics that are of no use, or I miss my guess, and I would rather pay them half price.

Mr. STAFFORD. If I catch the idea of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], it is merely to have the monthly statistics from September to January and not provide for the collecting of any statistics during the remainder of the year?

Mr. CANNON. Precisely.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman from Minnesota will yield a moment, I wish to say that this thought also occurs to me, that did not occur to me when I was on my feet before. It is this: The cottonseed-oil mills, the larger concerns, are even now crushing seed, and they will continue to crush seed probably for the next two or three months. It is true that a large part of the smaller mills, mills of 20 tons' capacity or 10 tons' capacity, have practically completed their year's business, but the larger concerns, the mills that really crush the great quantity of seed that is crushed, are continuing to run at this time, and will probably run until almost the beginning of the next crop season.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Would not a quarterly statement cover that situation?

Mr. LEVER. I prefer not to have that, I will say frankly.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Very good. I want a moment of my time in order to state my position.

Mr. Chairman, I happen to be a member of the Census Committee, and I am very proud of it. We have not had a great deal of work to do, but such as we have had we have given attention. I want to say that the greater portion of that work has had to do with legislation in reference to the gathering of statistics of tobacco and cotton. No other bills, so far as I know, are before our committee. Last year we had a bill having to do with the gathering of statistics of wheat. I want to say for the committee that it gave that bill the same consideration that it has given to these bills, and I know there is no feeling in the committee as to what section of the country a bill comes from.

I believe that statistics are necessary. I believe in the statement that has been made here to-day that we ought to unify the work and centralize it and get it under one head and not have it under several departments. The Census Committee has taken up that subject and has given it some thought, and has refused to permit legislation to come out that had for its purpose the dividing of the gathering of statistics and giving it to separate departments. And I want to say to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] that my main reason for desiring at this time the adoption of my amendment, or some other amendment like it, is to get legislation that will serve as a pattern for other legislation along the same line that will assist in gathering statistics of the crops of the North as well as of the South. And if this legislation is in such shape that it will work an unnecessary hardship, then it will discourage the passage of even meritorious legislation. Now is the time to frame legislation that will meet with general approval, and I trust the gentlemen who are behind this bill will not insist on requiring the reports so often, because it evidently is a burden to all connected with the trade as well as to the taxpayers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, as stated before, I come from a State that does not produce cotton in any appreciable extent, but I think I discern a weakness in the amendment offered by my good friend from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH], and I draw the lesson this way. From the statement of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] it seems to me that this cotton seed is garnered up as wheat is garnered in the elevator. While the cottonseed period may extend from September 1 to January 1, or February 1, it does not necessarily follow that all the cotton seed has been converted into oil or by-products within that period of time. But, like wheat in the elevator or corn in the elevator, it is being consumed from time to time. And the information that you want here is what you would want if it were a wheat proposition or a corn proposition; that is, that after the wheat has been thrashed or the corn has been garnered into the elevator you want to know how much there is on hand from month to month. I take it that the same condition would obtain in regard to cotton seed.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELM. With pleasure.

Mr. CULLOP. I would like to know if the market reports do not furnish this information to the public monthly, as the same information is published or furnished to the public through the reporters of corn and wheat markets every month, so that you can practically tell what the available supply on hand at the end of each month is and what part has been consumed, either in the domestic trade or exported for foreign trade.

Mr. HELM. As stated before, I do not come from a cotton-producing State. I know nothing about the cotton trade or the cottonseed trade, but the information I get from gentlemen who are around me is to the effect that they do not get the information through the trade reports as stated by you.

Mr. CULLOP. The gentleman is aware that in the corn and wheat markets every month the market reporter, showing the condition of the supply on hand, furnishes the public with information as to the amount of corn or wheat in the hands of the purchaser or in the elevators and the amount that has been engaged for export or consumption, or otherwise?

Mr. HELM. The only answer I can make to the gentleman's statement is——

Mr. CULLOP. Now, is not the same true with respect to the cotton market?

Mr. HELM. I think not. But along that line it takes an unusually well-posted or very shrewd and alert producer to be up to the market reports every day, whereas if this information is obtained by the Census Office the Members of Congress can obtain these monthly reports from the Bureau of the Census and mail them out to the men who are producing cotton, and in that way they get the information first hand, and it is more reliable, and the farmers can understand it better than they could when they see cotton seed quoted on the board of trade at such and such a price, or cotton at such and such a price.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I am not only opposed to the amendment, but I am opposed to the bill. I am opposed to this proposition. The gentleman will remember that last year, when the legislative bill was before the House, carrying a provision for $5,000,000 to make an agricultural census every five years, as a conferee on the part of the House I moved to strike out the provision. It did not go out the first time, but I think the second time I moved to strike it out the House adopted the motion, and we saved $5,000,000 by dropping that item from the bill.

Some of my city friends on this side asked me if I was making a mistake. They reminded me that I represent an agricultural dstrict. That is true. I represent a great agricultural district, but the only words that have been spoken to me by any one in my district concerning that act have been words of commendation. It would have been $5,000,000 wasted, and this bill is an attempt to engraft upon the statutes another act to reach into the Federal Treasury and take out not $10,000 a year, but maybe $100,000 a year to get all the information authorized and information that nobody would read.

Secretary Garrison a few weeks ago appeared before a committee of which I am a member, and said that if he wanted to hide something so that it would never be found, he would simply place it in some Government statistics and have it published, and nobody would ever read it.

Now, what are we doing? Here is an item to take monthly the statistics of cotton seed in the United States, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP], who ought to know better, says we are now collecting information of this kind with respect to corn and wheat. We are doing nothing of the kind.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. GOOD. Yes; I will yield for a question.

Mr. CULLOP. The gentleman misunderstood me. I asked the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] the question, Could they not get this same information in the same way as it is furnished to the grain farmer, by market reports?

Mr. GOOD. Yes. They ought to get them from the daily and weekly newspapers, and not reach their hands into the Treasury and ask the Government to pay for something that will do absolutely no good.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I can not; I have not time.

Mr. CULLOP. The gentleman misunderstood. He now agrees with me.

Mr. GOOD. I certainly agree with the gentleman if he is against this proposition and against legislation of this kind; and from what he now says, I must have completely misunderstood the gentleman, and I will join with my friend, the author of this bill, in going through his agricultural bill and other appropriation bills that come before this House, to strike out many of these useless appropriations for gathering statistics that practically nobody reads, and that do no good except to employ a vast army of men to bother the farmers of the United States and give employment to some good, deserving fellows.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman will yield just a moment, I would like to say that the gentleman's suggestion is not information to me. I have always found the members of the Committee on Appropriations ready to strike something out of the Agricultural bill.

Mr. GOOD. I am ready to strike out of any appropriation bill any item that calls for a useless expenditure of money; and a year ago I voted to strike out an item of $5,000,000 from a bill that came from my own committee.

Mr. LEVER. I think the gentleman was entirely right. If it had come from our committee, it would have been correct, I am sure.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, there are some other matters pending, and if the gentleman gets five minutes I would like to have the same time.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. HELM. The farmers ought to get this information from the daily papers and weekly papers. But before it is printed in the daily or weekly papers it is necessary that this information shall have been assembled by some one who is in a position to gather it.

Mr. GOOD. There is no more reason for the passage of a law for gathering these statistics than there would be for a law providing for the collection of statistics as to the number of bushels of wheat or corn or oats or any other farm product that happens to be in the barns of the farmers or in the mills or grain elevators at any one time.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I will.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Does the gentleman think it more unwise to get statistics as to our own industries in this country than it is to get statistics from the State Department as to foreign commerce for publication?

Mr. GOOD. I do not know what that has to do with this bill, and I do not understand the purport of the gentleman's remarks. But, gentlemen of the House——

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. CLINE. Is not the same argument that is applied to cotton applicable to every leading agricultural production?

Mr. GOOD. Absolutely; and I am opposed to the enactment of a law of this kind to apply to wheat or corn or oats or any of the products of my district. I think it is useless, a waste of Government funds, and I think the gentlemen overestimate the benefit that will come from legislation of this sort. The legislative bill carried last year for cotton field agents an appropriation of $240,000, and how many thousand dollars was provided in a lump-sum appropriation to pay the salaries of clerks in Washington for compiling this information I do not know, but I know it would amount to many thousand dollars more.

Now, take the Agricultural bill of last year. We appropriated for the control of the diseases of cotton and potatoes $56,000.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

Mr. GOOD. When I get through with this I will yield. Another item, for the acclimatization and adaptation and investigation of cotton, corn, and other crops, $37,500; obviously in large part for cotton. All could have been expended for that purpose.

Then comes an item of $166,700 for the crop estimates. Any amount of that can be used for crop estimates of cotton, and a large part of it is so used.

Then comes an item of $666,020 for the cotton boll weevil, and then another item, for investigation and demonstration of standards of cotton, $55,480. Where are you going to stop appropriating for cotton? Already the Government is paying out over $1,000,000 for this crop. Already we are paying out more than $250,000 just to get statistics for cotton alone. I do not believe we ought to do anything that is going to injure the cotton crop or the cotton growers. I would not by my vote do anything to prevent the cotton growers from improving their crop nor from increasing the yield; but, gentlemen, we are doing nothing of the kind if we defeat this measure. We are simply reaching our hand into the Treasury every time we get an opportunity to hire some good, deserving man, to give him a job, and I am opposed to it.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Is there an amendment pending?

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McLAUGHLIN: Page 1, line 5, after the word "of," strike out the remainder of the section and insert the following: "All nonperishable agricultural products, as determined by the Secretary of Agriculture, produced, and the quantity of each of these products on hand held by producers, manufacturers of, and dealers in such products, and the quantity imported and exported.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. HELM. It is not germane. This bill is applicable to one particular product, and can not apply to any other product.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. I hope the Chair will give an opportunity for something to be said in support of the amendment.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, if the amendment has gone out on a point of order, I do not see how it can be debatable.

Mr. MANN. The Chair asked the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] if he wanted to be heard on the point of order, which is usually an assumption that the other side does not need to be heard unless the Chair requests it.

Mr. HELM. I will reserve the point of order if gentlemen wish to discuss it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will give gentlemen an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the point of order will not lie against this amendment. This is a bill to provide for the taking of statistics, and it seems to me that it is proper to substitute one product for another or to enlarge the measure by the addition of other products concerning which the statistics are to be taken. The bill as it is before the committee provides for the taking of statistics concerning one and one alone of the agricultural products of the country. My amendment would enlarge the scope of the measure and provide for the taking of statistics concerning a number of products, the production, the amount on hand, the amount manufactured, the amount imported and exported, to say nothing of the virtue of the amendment that it is broad and fair and reasonable to all parts of the country and to all nonperishable agricultural products. It is not narrow or sectional or selfish, and it ought to commend itself to the House for that reason. I think for that reason alone, if for no other, it ought to be held in order by the Chair.

Now, it seems to me that the Congress has gone far enough in enacting legislation concerning particular products, or one particular product, or of one section of the country. That has been spoken of. I spoke of it myself a few minutes ago. I do not care to take further time of the House to consider it.

Mr. HELM. I renew the point of order.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I wish to urge another reason why I think this amendment is in order. It would provide for the employment, and necessarily must provide for the employment, of a horde of men to travel over the country to assist in the collection of these data. The idea that all this work could be done for the comparatively insignificant sum of $10,000——

Mr. HELM. I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the point of order.

Mr. GOOD. Yes; he is.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I do not wish to transgress any rule of this House, but what I have said bears, I believe, on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan will proceed.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. It will necessarily require the employment of a vast number of inspectors, men of one kind and another, to travel over the country and to gather these data. I think possibly this House is not paying sufficient attention to the fact that much legislation has been enacted and is being urged providing for or making necessary the employment of a vast number of men——

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. How does the gentleman reconcile the statement that this bill is going to require the employment of a horde of inspectors with the statement of the man who is in charge of this work, that it will not cost over $10,000 a year?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from South Carolina I will say that the official whom he quotes says that the estimate of the cost for the first year is only $10,000. We know how the activities of the Government grow. In the Department of Agriculture we started only three years ago the work of gathering statistics in relation to markets, and the first appropriation was only $50,000. I do not remember exactly how much it is this year, but my impression is that it is almost, if not quite, $1,000,000.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I will yield.

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman that the estimate that was made at the time we enacted the law to take an agricultural census every five years was that it would take only a few hundred thousand dollars, but when the estimate came in from the Census Department it was stated that it would cost $5,000,000. That is what they ask, and that is what the committee reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen will confine their remarks to the point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair indulge me?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will.

Mr. STAFFORD. If this bill related to only one single subject, that of collecting statistics referring to cottonseed, then I would agree that the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan is not in order. But it provides for the collection of statistics of more than one product, and you ascertain that not only from the title of the bill but from the bill as reported to this House. Nothing is more fundamental in the decisions of this House in construing the germaneness of amendments than that you must consider the bill as reported.

What do we find in this bill? Not merely the authorization to the Director of the Census to collect statistics, so far as cottonseed is concerned, but we find on page 3 a specific authorization for the collection of statistics as to lard, as to butterine, and as to oleomargarine.

It is true that that has been stricken out by committee amendment; but, nevertheless, nothing is more firmly held in decisions in this House than that in construing germane amendments the bill must be accepted as introduced originally in the House.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. ANDERSON. I want to call attention to the fact that on the first page of the bill it authorizes the collection of statistics as to the quantity of seed crushed in the mill, crude cottonseed products, and refined-oil products.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was coming to that further in supplementing my position that the bill also provides, as indicated by the gentleman from Minnesota, for the collection of statistics of seed crushed in the mills, cottonseed products, and refined oil.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman concede that these products named in the bill are all by-products of cotton seed?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oleo is not necessarily a by-product of cotton seed.

Mr. HARRISON. Is it not a fact that everything named is a by-product of cotton seed?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not necessarily. Cottonseed oil may be an ingredient of lard, but it does not have to be manufactured out of cottonseed oil. Here you are requiring statistics of lard, butterine, oleomargarine, and soap.

Mr. LEVER. This is not lard, it is compound lard.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is nothing said about compound butterine or compound oleomargarine. There are decisions which hold that if there are two subjects or more involved in a bill an amendment of a general character is in order. I direct the attention of the Chair to the Manual, section 780:

To a bill admitting several Territories into the Union an amendment adding another Territory is admissible. To a resolution embodying two distinct phases of international relationship an amendment embodying a third is germane. To a bill providing for the construction of building in each of two cities an amendment providing for similar buildings in several other cities is germane.

The bill is fundamentally a bill to collect statistics of products and relates to more than one kind of statistics of different character or product. The gentleman's amendment amplifies and makes it general, and therefore the rule that when a bill relates merely to one subject it can not be amended by adding another general subject does not apply, because this is more than a bill relating to one subject, for it relates to many.

Mr. LEVER. If the Chair please, the bill authorizes the Director of the Census to collect and publish statistics of cotton seed and cottonseed products, and in enumerating some of the cottonseed products I call attention of the Chair to the fact that the enumeration mentioned is this: Crude cottonseed products and refined oil products. It requires monthly statistics concerning the quantity of cotton seed received at oil mills, the quantity of seed crushed in such mills, the quantity of crude cottonseed products and refined oil produced, the quantities of these products shipped out of the mills and the quantities on hand, the quantities of crude cottonseed oil held by refiners, by manufacturers of compound lard, butterine, oleomargarine, soap, and other users of cottonseed oil.

Now, the purpose of the bill is to collect statistics as to cotton seed and its products which are held by manufacturers of compound lard, butterine, oleomargarine, and soap. Each of the manufacturers of these articles—compound lard, butterine, oleomargarine, and soap—use a large quantity of cottonseed oil in their manufacture.

Compound lard is a combination of certain fats with cottonseed oil. Butterine is likewise a combination of certain fats—beef and hog—with cottonseed oil. Oleomargarine is likewise some kind of a combination with cottonseed oil, and cottonseed oil is likewise used largely in the manufacture of soap. The bill proposes to collect the statistics of the amount of cottonseed oil that goes into the manufacture of these various compounds.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. I will.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Much oleomargarine is made without the use of cotton seed or cottonseed oil, is it not?

Mr. LEVER. I am not sure of that by any means; I know that a large amount of cottonseed oil is used in the manufacture of oleomargarine.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I will say that there is much oleomargarine made without the use of cotton seed or cottonseed oil. Certainly the gentleman knows that much soap is made without the use of either of these products. That being true, it provides for the investigation of other statistics concerning oil and butterine into which cottonseed oil enters, and then goes beyond the cottonseed oil and asks for statistics outside by requiring the manufacturers of all kinds of soap to give the information whether they use cottonseed oil or not.

Mr. LEVER. I want again to direct the Chair's attention to the language which you will find on page 1 of the bill:

The quantities of these products shipped out of the mills and the quantities of these products and of cotton seed on hand, the quantities of crude cottonseed oil held by refiners, by manufacturers of compound lard, butterine, oleomargarine, soap, and other users of cottonseed oil.

The bill proposes to gather statistics as to the amount of this kind of oil held by these manufacturers, and that is all there is to it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this bill is confined to the subject of gathering information relating to cotton seed and its products, and while it did enumerate the collection of statistics concerning compound lard, butterine, oleomargarine, and so forth, I believe that provision has already gone out of the bill.

Mr. LEVER. Yes; it has.

Mr. STAFFORD. It has not been acted upon.

Mr. MANN. Yes; the committee amendment has been agreed to. But whether it has or not, the statistics are to be collected merely in connection and as a part of the statistics relating to the cotton seed and cottonseed oil or its products. Of course, you might say the term "cotton seed and cottonseed oil" under construction of the rule was enumeration of two different classes, and under the rule that it would admit of a third class. But I do not think so. I think the Chair has a right to conclude that cotton seed and cottonseed products are one subject matter. If that is the case, under the construction of the rule which has been made many times, it is not germane to offer by way of amendment a proposition relating to an entirely different class. It seems to me that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota is not germane to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 8, after the word "exported," insert the following:
"Provided the cost of collection and publication of the statistics as herein provided for shall not exceed $10,000 per annum."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the committee report fixes the maximum cost of the collection and publication of these statistics at $10,000. I read from that portion of the report that pertains to this matter——

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, we will accept the amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. My amendment fixes the cost at $10,000, and the gentleman from Kentucky accepts it.

Mr. MANN. Let us have the amendment again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Chairman, following the amendment just adopted I offer this amendment, to add the following words:

Provided further, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to retail merchants.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. PARK: Following the amendment just adopted insert the words:
"Provided further, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to retail merchants."

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I think that we will be willing to accept that amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARK. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would the gentleman have any objection to extending his amendment to the entire act?

Mr. PARK. I would prefer to have it refer to the entire act.

Mr. STAFFORD. Instead of to the section. Then let the gentleman ask to modify his amendment by substituting the word "act" for the word "section."

Mr. PARK. I will accept that modification.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARK. Yes.

Mr. HILL. What is the use of raising a doubt as to whether it applies to a wholesale merchant? As I understand it, the committee has generally confined this to warehousemen, brokers, and exporters who are engaged in handling these products. It strikes me that to adopt this limitation respecting retail merchants would make it very much broader, so as to include wholesale merchants, housekeepers, and hotels.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Georgia yield?

Mr. PARK. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. I just want to reinforce the statement of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL]. I am inclined to think that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PARK], although a very eminent lawyer, is going to limit his own purpose very much if his amendment be adopted. I am satisfied that the amendment adopted a moment ago limiting the operation of this bill to brokers, exporters, and warehousemen engaged in handling these products is very much broader than the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia. If his amendment is to be accepted at all, he ought to include in it not only retail merchants but wholesale merchants, and if you are going to include them you will find other classes of people probably that ought to be included. The amendment that the committee has already adopted, it seems to me, absolutely excludes anyone except brokers, exporters, and warehousemen.

Mr. PARK. If that can be specifically stated in the act, it would be perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. LEVER. I think it is. The gentleman is a lawyer and I am not, but in construing the statute I am satisfied that any court would construe the statute to mean that this language applies only to brokers, exporters, and warehousemen, men engaged in handling these products.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Was there any purpose in leaving out importers? Exporters are included. Why were importers left out? I ask this, because prior to the European war it was frequently charged that cottonseed oil went out of the country as cottonseed oil and came back as "pure olive oil."

Mr. LEVER. I would say to the gentleman, without having any specific or definite information upon the subject, that my impression is that there is imported into the country no cottonseed oil, at least to any appreciable extent.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It has been charged that it did come back frequently as olive oil.

Mr. LEVER. Oh, it is better than olive oil.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Still it would come in as olive oil.

Mr. LEVER. It would come in as olive oil.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And surely that which comes into the country would have as much effect upon the producer's price as that which went out of the country.

Mr. MANN. The word "exporters" does not apply to exporters of cottonseed oil at all.

Mr. LEVER. It applies to cottonseed products.

Mr. MANN. No; it does not. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PARK] and also the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER]. As the bill was reported to the House, the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PARK] would be a very apt amendment, but the bill has already been amended, so that the amendment of the gentleman would make the bill worse than it is now instead of making it better. To say that you exclude retail dealers in soaps, oleomargarine, lard, butterine—and that is all this applies to—might mean that you include wholesale dealers, and that is not the purpose at all. The language as it reads now is:

Manufacturers of compound lard, butterine, oleomargarine, and soap, and by brokers, exporters, and warehousemen engaged in handling these products.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. PARK. I would say to the gentleman that my object is to make it plain that the retail merchants of the country town will not be subjected to this penalty.

Mr. MANN. It is perfectly plain that they will not be now, because the language in the bill originally which said "and others handling these products" has been changed, and the word "others" has gone out.

Mr. PARK. I think the gentleman is mistaken about striking out that portion of it.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

Mr. PARK. The amendment was "and others engaged."

Mr. MANN. No; the amendment was to strike out the word "others" and insert "engaged in," so that the bill now reads—oh, if the word "others" was in, the gentleman's amendment would be very apt.

Mr. PARK. I am willing to withdraw the amendment. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment after the gentleman's explanation.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making another suggestion. This language contained in the bill now directs the Director of the Census to ascertain the amount of cottonseed oil held by every exporter or broker or warehouseman of lard, butterine, oleomargarine, and so forth.

Now, what is the sense in requiring a soap manufacturer who has a warehouse, or some man who has soap in his warehouse, no cottonseed oil at all, to make a return every month of the amount of cottonseed oil he has on hand? He has no cottonseed oil. This language does not apply to brokers, exporters, or warehousemen engaged in handling cottonseed oil unless you change it. Now, the gentleman certainly does not want everybody who is a broker or an exporter or a warehouseman of lard, butterine, oleomargarine, or soap to make a return of the amount of cottonseed oil. It is the manufacturers of this you want to get. It may be all right to require the manufacturers of these things to make returns.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is what it is.

Mr. MANN. No; that is not what it is.

Mr. LEVER. Read the language of line 9.

Mr. MANN. All manufacturers of compound lard, butterine, oleomargarine, and soap and all brokers, exporters, and warehousemen engaged in the handling of those products. That plainly refers to the products which are named.

Mr. HOUSTON. On the page before it says they are to report the quantities of crude cottonseed oil held by those parties.

Mr. MANN. That is all right. The quantity of cottonseed oil held by refiners, by manufacturers of compound lard, butterine, oleomargarine, soap. That is one class, and then also the quantity of cottonseed oil held by brokers, exporters, warehousemen engaged in handling those products, which products are compound lard, oleomargarine, butterine, and so forth. They do not have any cottonseed oil. You might say, "engaged in handling cottonseed oil and its products."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to think the gentleman's criticism is well taken, and I think the language might be changed so that it would read "engaged in handling cottonseed oil."

Mr. MANN. That is all right.

Mr. LEVER. If the chairman of the committee is willing to accept the amendment, I would ask unanimous consent that the amendment previously adopted——

Mr. MANN. No; that does not affect the amendment previously adopted.

Mr. LEVER. Then I will offer the following amendment. Strike out the words "these products," in line 4, page 2, and insert in lieu thereof "crude cottonseed oil."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, by striking out the words "these products," in line 4, and insert in lieu thereof "crude cottonseed oil."

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, the amendment is thoroughly satisfactory to me if it is satisfactory to the author of the bill.

Mr. LEVER. It is satisfactory to me, and I think clears up the matter.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "statistics" insert "from September to January in each year and quarterly statistics during the remainder of the year."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I take it that this will meet the full acceptance of those who are desirous of obtaining these statistics during the season of the year when they are most desirable. From the statement of the author of this bill, there is need of having these statistics from September to January, but there is not that pressing need of having these statistics during the balance of the year. There is no need of having monthly statistics, running from January to September, when there is no pressing need of them. For instance, as to the collection of statistics on tobacco in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill we merely provided for quarterly returns. Why is there need of imposing this additional burden, not only upon the gatherers of these statistics but upon the people mentioned in the bill, to make returns monthly. I hope that gentlemen will agree to that and accept this liberal amendment. We furnish under this amendment everything that can reasonably be asked without imposing a great burden upon the persons who are going to furnish these statistics.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. HELM. An amendment has been adopted which limits the cost of this bill to $10,000, so there need be no apprehension about the matter from that standpoint.

Mr. STAFFORD. Though there has been a limitation of $10,000, I want that $10,000 used in such a period of the year when it will bring the greatest return and the greatest value to those for whom these statistics are desired. If you are going to spread this $10,000 over the 12 months, they are not going to produce much at all; and the gentleman admits that these statistics are mainly necessary during the four months of September to January.

Mr. HELM. Right there——

Mr. STAFFORD. Why not accept a reasonable proposition and have monthly statistics during that period when it is of the greatest value and not waste it, but let the $10,000, or three-quarters of it, be utilized during the time when it is most needed? Now I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HELM. The gentleman says that these reports would be published from September to January in each year. Are you accurate in your statement there?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes. That would be given a broad construction and not the narrow construction of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, just one moment on the amendment. I would like to call the attention of the committee to the fact that while the gentleman's amendment might be satisfactory to the producers of cotton seed and might serve all the purposes expected in the bill from that point of view, at the same time I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that some of the biggest oil mills in the country are running now. In other words, cotton seed, like all agricultural products, is gathered during the course of three or four or five months at the very most by the farmer and leaves the farmer's hands; but the consumption of these products covers a period not commensurate with the gathering period, but covers a period of 12 months or more, and therefore it is necessary to have these figures collected monthly, certainly more than quarterly, after the 1st of January, in order that the cotton trade—not perhaps so much the producers of cotton seed, but the intermediate handlers of these products—may have the statistics. For instance, as I said a moment ago, the cottonseed mill is interested in knowing how much the refiner has in the way of oil on hand.

The manufacturer of butterine will be interested to know how much cottonseed the refiner has on hand, and so on all along the line; and for the purpose of giving full information to the other end of the cottonseed business, I feel that these statistics should be collected.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield? Is there any more need for having quarterly reports so far as cottonseed products are concerned than for tobacco?

Mr. LEVER. I think not. The gentleman and I will not argue that proposition.

Mr. STAFFORD. We might have semimonthly returns, but what is the most practicable? Now that you have limited the expenditure to $10,000, wherein will it do the most good?

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman will bring in a bill here for gathering such statistics as to wheat and oats, and to make publication thereof in the regular way in which this bill has been drawn, he will find me in favor of it.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentlemen from the wheat belt recognize the fallacy of those statistics. The gentleman from Iowa has given his testimony as to that fact, and he comes directly from that district.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the information furnished by any individual establishment under the provisions of this act shall be considered as strictly confidential and shall be used only for the statistical purpose for which it is supplied. Any employee of the Bureau of the Census who, without the written authority of the Director of the Census, shall publish or communicate any information given into his possession by reason of his employment under the provisions of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not less than $300 or more than $1,000, or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both so fined and imprisoned, at the discretion of the court.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment, on page 2, line 18, to strike out the words "less than $300 or" after the word "not."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 2, line 18, by striking out the words "less than $300 or."

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. What is the gentleman's object in striking out the minimum of this punishment? It is punishment for a man who betrays the secrets of the census, who directly disobeys the law.

Mr. HOUSTON. The object is to comply with and conform to the system adopted by all the Federal statutes since the adoption of the Criminal Code. Offenses of a more serious nature, more heinous than this, have no minimum punishment, but we fix the maximum and leave the minimum to the discretion of the court.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman think that to have no minimum penalty fixed by law, but to leave it entirely to a judge to make the penalty as small as he may wish, is wise, even though such a provision is contained in the code? I have in mind recent newspaper reports, which I assume are true, that men convicted of misbranding foods and medicines—offenses that ought to be considered serious—were fined only $10. That is no punishment at all. Men punished only in that way will repeat their offenses.

I do not know why the law should not fix both a maximum and minimum penalty for its willful violation, nor why the punishment should be left entirely without a minimum to the discretion of a Federal judge. The people are entitled to protection. Punishment is not imposed in order to wreak revenge upon the offender, but to serve as a warning to others and thus to protect the innocent public; and a $10 fine for men who willfully violate statutes of such importance is no punishment at all.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman's question, I say that I unhesitatingly believe it is wise and best to strike out the minimum punishment here and in all other cases. That was the course adopted by the joint committee that prepared the Criminal Code; and that code, adopted by that committee, was adopted by this House and passed by this Congress.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman know of any State of this Union that has a statute like that?

Mr. HOUSTON. In answer to that I will say that I know of some States that have no minimum punishment in regard to certain offenses, and I give it to him as my honest judgment that where they do not have it they come nearer convicting men who are guilty and making them responsible for their crimes than they do where they have a large minimum penalty which results only in a defeat of conviction often at the hands of a jury, and men go unpunished because the least punishment is so severe.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman allow me right there to ask a question? The gentleman says that juries will sometimes not convict where the law fixes the minimum penalty, and thus men escape punishment. How much did the public profit by such convictions as those I mentioned, which resulted in fines of only $10?

Mr. HOUSTON. I have no occasion and no cause to answer why somebody has not been punished more than $10, or whether $10 fine was adequate. There may have been a judge somewhere who has grossly misused his powers and has not discharged his duties as a sworn officer of the law, but I have too much confidence in judges to believe we shall suffer from that here.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask for one minute more, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOUSTON. I want to say that I believe, and it is the consensus of opinion not only of the members of this committee but of the Members of the House and of this Congress, and of the bar and bench of this country, that it is best to leave out a minimum penalty. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the question propounded by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] a moment ago, I overlooked the provision in section 2 and the fact that the minimum punishment should go out. I want to call the attention of the committee to what section 2 is. I read:

SEC. 2. That the information furnished by any individual establishment under the provisions of this act shall be considered as strictly confidential and shall be used only for the statistical purpose for which it is supplied.

Now, that is the first proposition. The Government calls upon a manufacturer for information. The manufacturer cheerfully or uncheerfully gives the information. The information is given upon the assumption that it will be held in confidence and will not be used to hamper him in his business, or to give away his secrets to his competitors.

That is the first proposition. The second proposition is this, that—

Any employee of the Bureau of the Census who, without the written authority of the Director of the Census, shall publish or communicate any information given into his possession by reason of his employment under the provisions of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not less than $300 or more than $1,000, or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both so fined and imprisoned, at the discretion of the court.

Now, then, this section provides that any employee of the Census Bureau who shall take advantage of his position to give out confidential information, that has been gathered as confidential information, shall be punished, and I think the punishment to the extent of a fine of $300 as a minimum is an exceedingly small punishment for a man who will violate a confidence of that character.

Not only that, but older Members of this body will recall that some years ago there was a great scandal connected with one of the departments of this Government for the reason that some employee of that department gave out information that was confidential—that was gathered as confidential—information of a character that very greatly affected the value of a crop that is traded in on the various exchanges of this country, just as this oil is now traded in. Now, as to the other proposition, in section 3, I am inclined to think that the minimum might be eliminated there. But this is a different proposition. This is a proposition of gathering information in the utmost confidence, then punishing that employee of the department which gathers the information for making use of it for any purpose not authorized by the Director of the Census.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, you might fix the penalty as high as you please for the crime that you intend to punish, but it is not the severity of the penalty, but it is the certainty of conviction and enforcement that brings results. In many cases where you submit the cases to the jury, where there is a chance for the jury to believe that the court will be severe, or where there is no discretion vested in the court as to the punishment, either by fine or imprisonment, the tendency is to turn the defendant loose. In our State, as the gentleman says the United States statute is, in very few cases do we ever fix the minimum penalty. We fix the maximum, and then it is in the discretion of the court to fix the punishment that may be meted out.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. RAKER. In just one moment. Now, in this bill, if you want to make it effective, to the end that the jury will convict and that the court will enforce the punishment commensurate with the crime, strike out the provision that the gentleman has suggested and strike out the word "or" after "$1,000," on line 18, and strike out all of line 19, after the word "year," and all of section 20; and then you have this sort of punishment that may be meted out to a defendant if convicted, namely, that the court may fine him $1 or $1,000, and the court may impose an imprisonment sentence upon him. You make your statute effective; juries will convict. The man who betrays a secret of this kind ought not only to be fined a reasonable amount, but he ought to be imprisoned in addition. If you leave the fine without a minimum fixed, and leave the imprisonment without a minimum fixed, then the court must not only fine him, but must impose imprisonment for some reasonable time, for a day, or a month, or not exceeding one year. Where you want to have the violator convicted, and you believe that a man who violates confidence in a case of this kind not only should be punished by a fine but that the jury will convict him, you should leave it in the discretion of the court, saying that the court in its wisdom will fix that punishment commensurate with the crime.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I ask that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. HELM. Make it 17 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I merely wanted to call attention to the fact that in the Criminal Code where the fines are as great as $10,000 and where the imprisonment is as great as 10 years they have fixed no minimum penalty. While I admit that this is a serious offense, yet we have left it to the court to fix the fine anywhere under $1,000 and the imprisonment anywhere under one year.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I do not know what the practice has been in the courts which gentlemen evidently have had in mind while making their speeches, but in every court where I have been privileged to practice it has been the uniform habit—indeed, it is the duty—of the judge to charge the jury that the penalty is not a subject for them to take into consideration at all.

The judge instructs the jury that the legislature, in its wisdom, has by law fixed the limits within which the court can impose a penalty, and that the only duty of the jury is to say whether, under all of the facts in evidence and the law as laid down in his instructions, the defendant is guilty of the offense charged.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this amendment for at least two reasons which occur to me now.

In the first place, as I understand, the Criminal Code recently revised provides no minimum fines in other cases, and for the sake of uniformity this amendment ought to be adopted striking out the minimum fine.

I am for it in the next place because I believe it is more certain to result in convictions in proper cases where you have no minimum fine. That has been my observation in a great many cases. In the State from which I come it is a crime to sell a glass of whisky or beer in violation of the local-option law, and the lowest fine is $300. That fact often results in no conviction where guilt is proven because the jury will refuse to convict a defendant for selling a glass of whisky or beer in violation of the law, for they know that the accused must be fined not less than $300. If the fine was $25 or $50 or perhaps $100, convictions would be much more certain and the law would be better enforced. Now, my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] speaks of a Federal judge having in some cases fined defendants too small an amount—$10 I think he states, which he thinks was too small for the crime committed. My observation and experience have been that you can always trust a Federal judge to impose at least a fine which is plenty large. They are generally very bloody and are more inclined to impose a fine that is too large than one that is too small, in my opinion.

In answer to the suggestion that it will lead to more certain convictions the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] says that the jury does not fix the fine, that the court will fix the fine, and that therefore the jury will convict just as well regardless of the amount of the fine that may be imposed. But I want to call your attention to the fact that when the jury return their verdict they know what the lowest fine is, and if they know that it is $300 and they believe it is excessive for the crime committed they will refuse oftentimes to convict the defendant because of that fact, so that in my opinion it will lead to more certain convictions in proper cases where men ought to be convicted if there is no minimum fine fixed by law. And as I have said, my observation has led me to believe that you can always trust the Federal judges to impose a fine that is plenty big enough.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will be agreed to. I think it is a wise provision carried in the Criminal Code not to fix the minimum fine or the minimum punishment. Take a case under this section for instance. The employee of the Government who would deliberately give out this information in violation of the law ought to be imprisoned. A fine would not be sufficient. But suppose there is a question, and it is decided in the end that there has been a technical violation of the law where there has been no real criminal intent. It is desirable in such case that there may be a conviction as a precedent, without intention to inflict a heavy penalty.

Reference has been made to the pure-food law. There have been a great many cases under that law where the manufacturers of foods could not ascertain in advance whether they were violating the law or complying with the law, and the Department of Agriculture itself was not able to tell. The only way the matter could be determined would be by an adjudication in court, there being no criminal intent, but the only way to determine it being by a prosecution.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I have only a moment. In such a case there might be circumstances where a very small, nominal penalty should be imposed, the benefit being the decision of the court.

I was chairman of a committee in this House at one time in reference to pulp and paper. I undertook to obtain a lot of confidential information from the pulp and paper manufacturing establishments throughout the country. I submitted a long list of questions, principally prepared by the Census Bureau or by Mr. Stewart under my direction, with the statement that the information would be considered confidential. After it was all over I saw myself that all of those documents were burned up. But, believe me, while this matter was pending, although there was no penalty, so far as the law was concerned, I wondered many times whether some one connected with us would not inadvertently make some statement, and I can readily imagine that inadvertent statements might be made under some circumstances without any intent whatever to violate the law, where, under this provision, a man might be prosecuted and justly convicted but not deserve to be really punished.

Mr. KONOP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. KONOP. Even though there is a minimum punishment provided in the statute, can not the court, where there is a technical violation, suspend sentence entirely?

Mr. MANN. He can suspend the law, but that of itself is a violation of law. He has no right to do it, though frequently it is done.

Mr. KONOP. Ought not courts to suspend sentence sometimes?

Mr. MANN. Oh, they do; because frequently they will not impose the penalty fixed by law which the law says shall be imposed upon conviction; and that of itself shows the absurdity of it, because we make the courts, that ought always to preserve the law, violate the law when they suspend a sentence.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of this amendment. Whether it has been the policy heretofore adhered to or not, there can be no one better advised as to what the punishment in a given case should be than the presiding judge who hears the case. It occurs to me that in all cases we should leave to the court the amount of punishment to be meted out under certain circumstances. All criminals are not alike, and all violators of a statute should not receive the same punishment. The amendment suggested by the gentleman from California is to my mind even worse than the provision of the bill as it now stands. I am not in favor of a statute in cases of this character which provides that whenever it is violated the one who violates the statute must be imprisoned. This should be left to the discretion of the presiding judge, who is better qualified to pass upon it than we are. We should only adopt a maximum penalty, and the court should be given a great deal of latitude in fixing just what this punishment should be in a given case.

I am unable to understand how he can construe the amendment he suggests to be better than the bill as it now stands. We can do no better in my judgment than to fix a maximum penalty. The question of punishment then comes up to the discretion of the court, and I have great confidence that after the case has been heard and all the evidence has been submitted, and all the circumstances presented to the court, that a reasonable and fair punishment will be meted out. I am not in favor of placing a punishment here which the court in its judgment in a given case would not approve.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, in lines 19 and 20, by striking out the words "so fined and imprisoned at the discretion of the court."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 19, after the word "both," strike out the words "so fined and imprisoned at the discretion of the court."

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I ask that all debate on this amendment and amendments thereto be limited to five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and amendments thereto be limited to five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, by striking out these words you leave the section to read in this way: "Be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both." The additional language is absolutely unnecessary and merely cumbers the statute.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, we are willing to accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 19, page 2, the word "for."

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, we will accept that amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of every owner, president, treasurer, secretary, director, or other officer or agent of any cottonseed-oil mill, manufacturing establishment, or warehouse where cottonseed products are produced, manufactured, or stored, whether conducted as a corporation, firm, limited partnership, or by individuals, when requested by the Director of the Census or by any special agent or other employee of the Bureau of the Census acting under the instructions of said director, to furnish completely and correctly, to the best of his knowledge, all of the information concerning the quantity of cotton seed received, consumed, or on hand, and the quantity of crude and refined oil, cake and meal, hulls and linters produced, and the quantity of these products sold and shipped and on hand, and the quantity of compound lard, butterine, and oleomargarine on hand. The request of the Director of the Census for information concerning the quantity of cotton seed received, consumed, and on hand, the quantity of crude oil and other products sold and shipped, and the quantity of crude oil consumed and products manufactured therefrom and stocks on hand may be made in writing or by a visiting representative, and if made in writing shall be forwarded by registered mail, and the registry receipt of the Post Office Department shall be accepted as evidence of such demand. Any owner, president, treasurer, secretary, director, or other officer or agent of any manufacturing establishment, warehouse, or other place where cotton seed and cottonseed products are manufactured or stored, who, under the conditions hereinbefore stated, shall refuse or willfully neglect to furnish any of the information herein provided for or shall willfully give answers that are false shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $300 or more than $1,000 or imprisoned for a period of not exceeding one year, or both so fined and imprisoned, at the discretion of the court.

The following committee amendments were agreed to:

Page 3, line 9, after the word "products," strike out the words "sold and."

Page 3, lines 10 and 11, strike out the words "and the quantity of compound lard, butterine, and oleomargarine on hand."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman, the chairman of the committee, expect to modify this section as the other section was modified?

Mr. HOUSTON. I have an amendment to the latter part of the section.

Mr. MANN. I do not mean the penalty. Of course this section as it stands gives to the Director of the Census the power to make anybody in the country who has any of those establishments, anybody in the country where cottonseed products are produced, manufactured, or stored, one who has a pail of oleomargarine or a pail of compound lard, or a cake of soap even, comply with this law. I do not suppose the Director of the Census would send over here and ask the janitor of the building whether he had a lot of this product on hand, but this bill would authorize him to do it and punish the man if he did not make return. I ask whether gentlemen are satisfied to have that sort of a provision go into law?

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the object and purpose of the bill is restricted to the manufacturers of cottonseed oil, and restricted to the manufacturing concerns and warehouses, and does not intend to go into private families.

Mr. MANN. I do not suppose it is intended to go into private families, but you might go into retail and wholesale stores and various other places. I have discovered that while we have to have a good deal of confidence in the discretion of administrative officers, it is usually abused by some one in the course of time. No one who has ever had any dealings—and certainly my friend from Kentucky is familiar with that situation—with the internal-revenue office, knows that it lays down rules that are inexorable. They do not hesitate to take anybody or anything at any time when they want to. I am not complaining about that.

Mr. HELM. And they give some very liberal and generous constructions at other times.

Mr. MANN. They often do; I am not complaining of the office, but everybody knows how arbitrary they do get at times. We have to give them the power, because it is a taxation law. I am not sure that we should give them this power as to the collection of statistics. Section 1 has been changed so it is a reasonably fair section. All of this information, all these changes we have made in section 1 do not amount to anything with section 3 as it now stands left in the bill.

Mr. HELM. What suggestion has the gentleman to make?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I take it that the language "or other place where cottonseed products are produced, manufactured, or stored, whether conducted as a corporation, firm, limited partnership, or by individuals" if stricken out would probably meet the criticism that the gentleman from Illinois makes.

Mr. MANN. I should think that would meet the situation probably, as to that part of the section, anyway.

Mr. LEVER. The amendment would have to be drafted a little differently from that, but, I think, it will reach what the gentleman has in mind. I do not think anyone would construe the statute as broadly as the gentleman has construed it, but they might.

Mr. MANN. There will be lots of cases that will be along the dividing line, no doubt.

Mr. LEVER. That is very true.

Mr. MANN. While we may have absolute confidence in the present Director of the Census and the present Census Office, yet we might after a while put a Republican in there and he might want to be foolish. We have known many of them who were.

Mr. HELM. That is almost a habit with them, is it not?

Mr. MANN. It is almost a habit with the people to elect Republicans and put them in place, and they will soon get into the habit again.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the committee amendment. Following the query proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], I would like to inquire of the author of the bill what is the purpose of ascertaining the statistics as to the quantity of cottonseed oil that is shipped? I thought the purpose was to obtain statistics of cottonseed oil and products on hand. Is not that rather a harsh requirement to have placed on warehousemen and manufacturing establishments, to inquire as to the amount that has been shipped? Are you not prying into the private affairs of an individual when you ascertain the quantity that has been shipped?

Mr. LEVER. Where is that language to which the gentleman refers?

Mr. STAFFORD. In line 9, page 3.

Mr. LEVER. "Sold and shipped"?

Mr. STAFFORD. "And the quantity of these products sold and shipped." You are striking out "sold."

Mr. LEVER. I understood "shipped" was going out, too.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understood the real purpose was to ascertain the amount of this cottonseed oil and products on hand, but when you inquire of a manufacturer as to the quantity that has been shipped during the month, are you not going pretty far in inquiring into his private affairs?

Mr. LEVER. That would be a very good way of getting at the volume of business and checking him up as against his former reports.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do you wish to act as an investigator of his private affairs, or are you only desirous of ascertaining the amount that is on hand? With the present phraseology, I think you are going very far indeed and not really obtaining any valuable information for the purpose designed.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman will permit, I would like to take up, first, the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], if I can get his attention.

Mr. STAFFORD. Very well.

Mr. MANN. Let us dispose of the committee amendment.

Mr. LEVER. Very well.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to read that section as I would propose it?

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Was the last committee amendment ever adopted?

The CHAIRMAN. No.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 10385. An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4671. An act to exempt from cancellation certain desert-land entries in Riverside County, Cal.

STATISTICS OF COTTON SEED AND COTTONSEED PRODUCTS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. See if this would not cover the purpose of the committee and obviate the objections that some raise to it:

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of every owner, president, treasurer, secretary, director, or other officer or agent of any cottonseed-oil mill, manufacturing establishment, and warehouse where cottonseed products are produced, manufactured, or stored, whether conducted as a corporation, firm, limited partnership, or by individuals, when requested by the Director of the Census or by any special agent or other employee of the Bureau of the Census acting under the instructions of said director, to furnish completely and correctly, to the best of his knowledge, all of the information concerning the quantity of cotton seed received, consumed, or on hand, and the quantity of crude and refined oil, cake and meal, hulls and linters produced, and the quantity of these products shipped and on hand.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman please stop there? The gentleman from Oklahoma suggested the very amendment that the gentleman from Connecticut is suggesting, namely, to strike out the words "and other places."

Mr. HILL. Yes; but you want to precede the word "warehouse" with the word "and."

Mr. LEVER. If we do that, it will certainly meet the objections raised by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and it will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. MANN. I do not think I will object to that, although I think if the gentleman would strike out the language he suggested awhile ago it would meet the whole situation.

Mr. LEVER. I think it does; but I am inclined to think the amendment I suggested awhile ago might be carrying it further than I would desire to go.

Mr. MANN. I thought so at first, but it would not.

Mr. LEVER. I would like to know the amount of cottonseed oil that is in the hands of a limited partnership, and if you cut that out——

Mr. MANN. That is, the owner.

Mr. LEVER. If you go back to the word——

Mr. MANN. The owner; he is the one. You have no penalty against anybody except the people now. You cover everybody who can have possession of or own or control every mill, manufacturing establishment, or warehouse. That is all you want to do.

Mr. LEVER. I want to suggest the amendment should come at line 18, after the word "establishment," insert the word "and," and strike out——

Mr. MANN. It should be "or."

Mr. LEVER. It should be "or" instead of "and," and strike out after the word "warehouse," in line 19——

Mr. MANN. Line 24.

Mr. LEVER. Line 24. I have another bill here; and strike out the language "or other place where cotton seed and cottonseed products are manufactured or stored, whether conducted as a corporation, firm, limited partnership, or by individuals."

Mr. MANN. Down to the word "individuals."

Mr. LEVER. To the word "when," on page 2. I think that is right.

Mr. MANN. Insert the word "or" before the word "warehouse," in line 24, and strike out, after the word "warehouse," in line 24, page 2, down to and including the word "individuals," line 1, page 3. That is the amendment.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer that as an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The question first is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the chairman of the committee a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois:

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 24, before the word "warehouse" insert the word "or," and after the word "warehouse" strike out the following language: "or other place where cottonseed products are produced, manufactured, or stored, whether conducted as a corporation, firm, limited partnership, or by individuals."

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, it occurs to me the words "whether conducted as a corporation, firm, limited partnership, or by individuals," is simply descriptive of the character and kind of warehouse.

Mr. MANN. Let me restate this amendment. Before the word "warehouse" insert the word "or" and after the word "warehouse" strike out "or other place."

Mr. LEVER. That is all right.

Mr. MANN. Then, in line 25, strike out after the word "stored" down to and including the word "individuals," in line 1, page 3.

Mr. HELM. I hope the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. MANN. That is absolutely unnecessary.

Mr. HELM. This is dealing with a variety of different establishments, your cottonseed mill, your manufacturing establishment, your warehouse; and these words the gentleman is now seeking to strike out are merely descriptive of the different types of oil mills or manufacturing establishments or warehouses.

Mr. MANN. I know; but it is a limitation of description that ought never to be in the statute at all. You describe everything when you describe the owner. Then you go ahead in addition when you reach the officials of the corporation and you describe the president, the treasurer, the secretary, the director, or other officer or agent, but the word "owner" covers the words "corporation, firm, limited partnership, or individuals," absolutely.

Mr. LEVER. So that the bill would read——

Mr. MANN. The bill would read, beginning line 23—

Of any cottonseed-oil mill, manufacturing establishment, or warehouse, where cottonseed products are produced, manufactured, or stored, when requested—

And so forth.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, that is satisfactory, and I offer it as an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modified amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 24, before the word "warehouse," insert the word "or," and, after the word "warehouse," strike out the words "or other place," and, in line 25, after the word "stored," strike out the words "whether conducted as a corporation, firm, limited partnership, or by individuals."

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I accept the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I understand the Clerk has read all of this last section?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I believe the committee amendment on lines 10 and 11 has not yet been acted upon.

Mr. MANN. Yes; it has.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I surrender.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 3, strike out the words "not less than $300 or."

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, we accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, there is another amendment I wish to offer: On page 4, beginning in line 3, after the figures "$1,000," strike out "or imprisoned for a period of not exceeding one year, or both so fined and imprisoned."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 3, after the figures "$1,000," strike out the words "or imprisoned for a period of not exceeding one year, or both so fined and imprisoned."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 14, page 3, the words "sold and."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 14, strike out the words "sold and."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman now, with the changes which have been made, does he desire that all these concerns shall report not only the quantity of crude oil on hand but the quantity of products manufactured from crude oil? I take it that the gentleman does not desire to have the department ask how much soap has been made where they use crude oil?

Mr. LEVER. What we are trying to get at is the amount of cottonseed oil consumed in these various places.

Mr. MANN. The quantity of crude oil consumed is all right, but you add here, in line 15, "products manufactured therefrom and stocks on hand," and so forth. There certainly is no object in having the department ascertain how much soap has been made, except to see how much crude cottonseed oil has been used in the manufacture of it.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman's suggestion would be to strike out the words "products manufactured therefrom," so that it would read:

The quantity of crude oil consumed and stocks on hand.

I take it that the word "stocks" there refers to the oil on hand.

Mr. MANN. It would if left that way. It says—

The quantity of crude oil and other products sold and shipped.

The words "and other products" ought to go out.

Mr. LEVER. If we accept the other amendment?

Mr. MANN. Yes. And then after "the quantity of crude oil consumed," strike out the words "and products manufactured therefrom." That would give you the facts about the crude oil.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

On page 3, line 14, strike out the words "and other products," and on line 15, page 3, strike out, after the word "consumed," the words "and products manufactured therefrom."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 14, strike out the words "and other products sold and." And on line 15, after the word "consumed," strike out the words "and products manufactured therefrom."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to insert, in line 19, page 3, before the word "evidence," the words "prima facie."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 19, before the word "evidence," insert the words "prima facie."

Mr. LEVER. That is satisfactory to us.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 22, page 3, the words "or other place" and insert, after the word "establishment," the word "or."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 22, before the word "warehouse," insert the word "or," and after the word "warehouse" strike out the words "or other place."

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that that change is about to be made; and I think it is quite proper that instead of striking out or making that change to strike out the words "or other place" and insert the words "cotton-oil mill," which in the first part of the section is described as "any cotton-oil mill, manufacturing establishment, warehouse, or other place where cottonseed products are produced, manufactured, or stored," and so forth. Of course this is intended to cover exactly the same thing.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by inserting after the word "any," in line 21, "cottonseed-oil mill."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modified amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 2, after the word "any," insert the words "cottonseed-oil mill."

Mr. STAFFORD. So as to read——

The Clerk read as follows:

So as to read: "or other officer or agent of any cottonseed-oil mill or any manufacturing establishment or warehouse where cotton seed and cottonseed products are manufactured," etc.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out, on line 5, page 4, the words "at the discretion of the court." The bill as amended then would read "upon conviction thereof shall be fined not more than $1,000"; and the words, "or imprisoned for a period of not exceeding one year, or both so fined and imprisoned," having been stricken out, the words "at the discretion of the court" ought to be stricken out. So I move to amend the bill by striking out those words.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 5, strike out the words "in the discretion of the court."

Mr. CULLOP. The chairman of the committee in charge of the bill agrees to the amendment. The adoption of this amendment will improve the phraseology of the bill and clearly state its intention. There can be no doubt but that the framers of this bill intend that parties violating its provisions, upon conviction, shall be punished. Yet if the words "at the discretion of the court" were left in the bill it would be optional with the court trying the case whether he should be punished, even though the accused be found guilty. Such is not the intention of the author of the bill or the committee having it in charge. Their object and purpose is to have parties punished for the violation of its provisions, and hence the adoption of this amendment is essential to carry its purpose into effect and secure the result which its purpose clearly makes manifest.

Mr. Chairman, I doubt the advisability of this legislation, as I do not believe it will produce a cure for the evil of which complaint is made; but, be that as it may, if enacted at all it should be in such form as to prevent its provisions from being made nugatory by courts trying cases prosecuted under it. I believe the information expected to be obtained through its enactment can now be secured by those who desire it from the daily press of the country, information that will serve every purpose this legislation is intended to serve, just as reliable and much more quickly to the interested parties. The enterprise of the press daily furnishes the information sought to be obtained by this legislation, reliable and without public expense. The public demand is therefore complied with and the public interest already conserved. I hope the amendment I have offered will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of suggesting that the word "stocks," in line 16, should be singular and not plural.

Mr. LEVER. We think it immaterial over here, Mr. Chairman, but we have no objection to making it singular instead of plural.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, line 16, by striking out the letter "s" in the word "stocks."

Mr. MANN. It should be "stocks."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report to the House the bill with sundry amendments, with the recommendations that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. STEELE of Pennsylvania, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4767) authorizing the Director of the Census to collect and publish statistics of cotton seed and cottonseed products, had directed him to report it back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to demand a separate vote, although I do not propose to ask for one, this committee has the call next Wednesday. It has another bill. Does the chairman of the committee expect to go on with that other bill to-night?

Mr. HELM. We propose to call it up and start with it.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] demands a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 67, noes 31.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. HELM, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed las laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 2960. An act for the relief of the heirs of John Howard Payne, deceased, late United States consul at Tunis;

H. R. 8493. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 13043. An act making appropriations to supply further additional urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1916 and prior fiscal years; and

H. R. 13768. An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the Military Establishment for the fiscal year 1916.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the speaker signed the same:

H. R. 10037. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. J. Res. 68. Joint resolution to cede to the State of Maryland temporary jurisdiction over certain lands in the Fort McHenry Military Reservation; and

H. R. 11078. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is concerning a statement made yesterday on the floor of the House by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] with reference to an occurrence during the Civil War, which is, in my judgment, highly slanderous against the people of my district, and especially of the city of Gainesville. I desire to take not more than three or five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman's name involved in any way?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. My name was involved in it directly.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will read the language complained of, to see if it is a matter of privilege.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I have not all the language here, Mr. Speaker, and I will withdraw the request and present it in the morning.

BRIDGE ACROSS TENNESSEE RIVER, CHATTANOOGA, TENN.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4657) to authorize the Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railway Co. to rebuild and reconstruct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Tennessee River near Chattanooga, in Hamilton County, in the State of Tennessee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which the Clerk will report.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HELM. Has not the Committee on the Census the right of way?

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly; but the gentleman from Tennessee is asking unanimous consent to consider an emergency matter. He has stated to the Speaker that it would not take more than three or four minutes. The gentleman from Kentucky does not lose any rights. The Clerk will report the bill presented by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON].

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railway Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Ohio, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to rebuild and reconstruct, maintain, and operate the bridge and the approaches thereto leased by it from the trustees of the Cincinnati Southern Railway, a railroad existing by virtue of the laws of the States of Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee, across the Tennessee River near the city of Chattanooga, in Hamilton County, in the State of Tennessee, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, let the gentleman from Tennessee make his statement.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I would not have asked unanimous consent for the consideration of this measure now, but for the fact that it is an emergency proposition. A freight train fell through a bridge over the Tennessee river 6 miles above the city of Chattanooga, on the Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railway, and carried into the river with it two spans of the bridge. Under the law it is necessary to obtain the consent of Congress in order that the railway company may rebuild the bridge. At present in order to reach Chattanooga from Cincinnati it becomes necessary for the railway to send the trains around via Knoxville, increasing the distance from 100 to 150 miles. This is a great loss to the city of Cincinnati, which is the owner of this railroad, as well as to the Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railway, the operating company.

Mr. MANN. I understand the situation. I have examined the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. MOON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

STATISTICS OF RAW AND PREPARED COTTON, ETC.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up House joint resolution 103 on the Union Calendar, and ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FESS. The fact that a bill is on the Unanimous Consent Calendar and also on the Union or House Calendar does not prevent its being called up on calendar Wednesday?

The SPEAKER. The Unanimous Consent Calendar is a sort of supplement to the other calendars for the purpose of expediting bills.

Mr. FESS. And it can be on either calendar?

The SPEAKER. It has to be on one or the other to be on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

Mr. FESS. Putting it on the Unanimous Consent Calendar does not take it off the other?

The SPEAKER. It does not; it has no affect on it.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. DOREMUS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House joint resolution 103, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 103.

Authorizing and directing the Director of the Census to collect and publish additional statistics.

Resolved, etc., That the Director of the Census be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to collect and publish statistics of raw and prepared cotton and linters, cotton waste, and hull fiber consumed in the manufacture of gun cotton and explosives of all kinds, and of absorbent and medicated cotton during the calendar year 1915, and quarterly thereafter, and the quantity held in such establishments at the end of each quarter. The statistics herein provided for are in addition to those now collected in compliance with the act of Congress approved July 22, 1912, the provisions of that act being made applicable to and governing the collection and publication of the data.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, is the gentleman from Kentucky willing for me to be recognized? I hope the gentleman will go ahead next week with this bill.

Mr. HELM. That was my intention, unless there was no opposition to the bill.

Mr. MANN. There will be some opposition; but I would like, if I could, to let the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] proceed for 15 minutes in my time, but not on this bill.

Mr. HELM. All right, and then I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. MANN. I ask that the gentleman from Oklahoma be recognized for 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Oklahoma proceed for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate very much the courtesy that has been extended to me. I express my sincere thanks to the House for the unanimous consent that has been given me to speak at this time. I wish to make some observations upon a subject which I regard of very great importance to the entire country. When the first session of the Sixty-fourth Congress convened on the 7th day of last December I was enthusiastic in the belief that before this session adjourned we would enact a satisfactory rural-credit law. I frankly confess that my enthusiasm has waned. I am not at present so optimistic. Indeed, I am very apprehensive that already there has been such delay on the part of the Banking and Currency Committee of the House in reporting a bill as to endanger any rural-credit legislation at this session of Congress.

Mr. Chairman, I shall say nothing to-day that is intended as a criticism upon the Banking and Currency Committee, upon its chairman, or upon any individual member thereof. I hold each and every member of that committee in the very highest esteem. I am not charging, intimating, or insinuating that the committee as a whole or that any member thereof has failed to do his full duty. Yet, Mr. Chairman, I regard this subject as of such great importance, and I am so deeply interested in it myself that if I could, without offense, I would be very glad to say something that would induce the Banking and Currency Committee to promptly report a rural-credit bill to the House. My sole object is to expedite rural-credit legislation. My only purpose is to induce the committee to report a bill at once and secure its consideration by the House at the very earliest date possible. In the name of the 6,500,000 farmers of the United States, I protest against any further delay in rural-credit legislation. I appeal to the leaders of the majority party in this House to see to it that rural-credit legislation is not placed in still greater jeopardy by a further postponement of its consideration.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Does the gentleman know the present status of that bill in the Banking and Currency Committee?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I know that it has not been reported to the House.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Does the gentleman think that if it had been reported to the House it would have been considered before now?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I do not know what would have been done but I know what could have been done if a majority of the Members of the House were in favor of it. A majority can act upon a measure whenever it chooses. The proceedings of the House are always under the control of the majority. During this session we have consumed much time in passing other bills which, in my judgment, are insignificant in importance compared with rural-credit legislation. A rural-credit bill could have been passed long ago if a majority of the Members of the House were in good faith in favor of such legislation.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. That is a big "if."

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. It is a big "if," and there is the difficulty. That is one reason why I am losing my faith in rural-credit legislation at this session of Congress. We can only judge the future by the past. We were led to believe that the Sixty-third Congress would enact rural-credit legislation. It was given out through the press that this legislation was a part of the administration program for the Sixty-third Congress. We were told, and the farmers of the United States were promised, that rural-credit legislation would follow the passage of the banking and currency act. So it may, but it will follow it a long ways in the rear. Nearly three years have passed since the House passed the banking and currency bill, but so far the banking and currency committee has not even reported a rural-credit bill to the House.

What has been the history of the movement to establish, through congressional action, a great rural-credit system for the agricultural interests of the United States? On the 3d of March, 1913, Congress, through legislative enactment, authorized the appointment of a commission to go abroad and study the rural-credit systems of European countries. In January, 1914, that commission made its report. It prepared and submitted to the House a bill. That bill was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Sixty-third Congress in January, 1914. More than a year passed before that Congress expired by limitation of law. The Banking and Currency Committee, however, held this bill and all other rural-credit bills until Congress adjourned, without reporting thereon. Near the close of that Congress another step was taken. A joint committee of the two Houses was appointed. This committee was composed of six Senators and six Representatives. The committee was required to report by January 1, 1916. It had 10 months in which to consider the subject, to do its work, and submit its report. It submitted its report on time, or about on time. The report was an exhaustive one and included a carefully prepared bill, which was introduced into the House and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. I think this was on the 4th day of last January. Nearly three years have passed since Congress authorized the appointment of the commission to go abroad and study rural credits. Over two years have passed since this commission made its report and submitted a bill, which was introduced into the House and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. More than one year has passed since the joint committee of the two Houses was appointed to investigate the subject and report a bill or bills to Congress. Nearly four months have passed since the bill reported by the joint committee was introduced and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. In the meantime quite a large number of Representatives have prepared and introduced bills in this House, which have been referred to the Banking and Currency Committee, but there all these bills have remained. Up to this time no report has come from the Banking and Currency Committee.

I do not know why the committee has not acted. I do not know why a bill has not been reported. I am not familiar with the difficulties that have confronted the committee. I do not know what have been the insurmountable obstacles with which the committee might have had to contend. I do know that probably one-half of this session has passed and that there has been no rural-credit bill reported to this House. I do know that the House Calendar is crowded. I do know that many important legislative propositions are crowding upon Congress for consideration. I do know that experience and observation in legislation of the National Congress teach us that it is an easy matter to obstruct useful legislation during the latter part of a session of Congress. In all candor I am compelled to assert that in my judgment there has already been sufficient delay to place rural-credit legislation at this session of Congress in grave jeopardy.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes; I gladly yield to my colleague.

Mr. PLATT. Does not the gentleman think the trouble is that a certain number of radicals on the other side of the aisle are unwilling to consider and pass the bill reported from that commission?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I do not know how that may be. There may be radicals and there may be conservatives. It is not probable, however, that they are evenly divided. I should think there would be a majority either of the radicals or of the conservatives. That majority could act and should act. It is not necessary that the committee report shall be unanimous. A minority report of a committee is not unusual.

Mr. EAGLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. EAGLE. I would like to help the gentleman from Oklahoma reply to the question propounded by the gentleman from New York. I am quite in sympathy with the observations made by the gentleman from Oklahoma, but the trouble is there is a very abundant stock of conservatives now ruling the Banking and Currency Committee.

Mr. PLATT. Does the gentleman think that the commission reported a bill which could have been passed?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Legislation goes step by step. The Banking and Currency Committee had that bill for 13 months during the Sixty-third Congress and made no report to this House.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. HOWARD. Does the gentleman understand that the majority the other night at its caucus agreed to pass a rural-credit bill before adjournment, and that that was included in the President's program, who is a very enthusiastic supporter of rural-credit legislation?

Mr. PLATT. How could the gentleman know what occurred in a Democratic caucus?

Mr. HOWARD. Oh, I mean from the press report. Of course nobody would divulge the secrets of that caucus. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman from Oklahoma yield, so that I may ask the gentleman from Georgia what kind of a rural-credit bill the President is in favor of?

Mr. HOWARD. Oh, he is in favor of real rural-credit legislation, that will give such remedial relief to the farmers as they have been asking for years from the Republican Party. They asked for bread, and they were handed a stone.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman from Georgia follow that up by stating when the President indicated that, and how?

Mr. HOWARD. Oh, the President has been a most enthusiastic supporter of rural-credit legislation, not only since he has been President but before he became President of the United States. [Laughter on the Republican side.] The gentleman is short on history.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, in all candor, if there is any member of the Committee on Banking and Currency here who can tell the committee just about when that rural-credit bill will be reported, I will pause for a moment for an answer.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, I would be very glad to answer the question.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Oh, I did not know that the chairman of the committee was here. I will gladly yield to him.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, I will say to my friend that the rural-credit bill is ready to be reported and will be reported just as soon as the business of the House will give us an opportunity to consider it.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the distinguished chairman of that committee, says that that bill will be reported to the House just as soon as the House is in a position to consider it. There is the danger. From what the chairman of the committee says, the bill will not be reported until the House is ready to consider it. The committee has certainly overlooked the fact that Members of this House are entitled to have a reasonable time to study the bill, after it has been reported, before the bill is taken up for consideration. It is a comprehensive bill, covering nearly 100 pages of printed matter. Is it to be brought in here one day and placed upon its passage the next? I have heard it intimated by somebody that there would be but little time for discussion. We have a right, those of us who are interested, to have time in which to study the measure after it is reported before it is brought up in the House for consideration.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit another interruption——

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Certainly. I am glad to yield to the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee.

Mr. GLASS. I will say to him that if the House does not hurry up and get ready for it we are going to the Committee on Rules and will try to get a rule to bring the bill in, and there will be ample opportunity for debate.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, one other thing. The farmers of this country are interested in the kind of rural-credit legislation that we shall enact. The editors of the agricultural papers are interested, and there are many students of the subject all over the country. After the bill is reported reasonable time should be given before its consideration for the farmers to study the bill. If you do not hear from the country before you pass the bill, you may hear from it afterwards in a way that will not be pleasant.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman's contention is that if the bill is ready to be reported, it ought to be reported, so those who know nothing about it and would like to know something about it can have an opportunity to study it?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. That is the point. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to study that bill; I would like to have some time to study it. There have been various propositions, and how do we know what this committee will report? How does anyone know what the committee will report? We have no knowledge, and I can not study the bill until the bill is here and reported for our consideration.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I will.

Mr. HOWARD. As a matter of fact, the creation of a system of rural credits—and I know the gentleman has much knowledge of that question——

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. HOWARD. The creation of a system of rural credits is a much more intricate proposition than the creation of the Federal reserve act; does not the gentleman think that?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I think so. I contend, and I want to call attention to the fact—and I am in earnest about this matter, absolutely sincere, and I am not talking now simply to be heard—but both parties in this House are on record in favor of this legislation. Both parties, almost by similar language, declared in 1912 that rural-credit legislation was important as a reform of the banking and curency system of this country. Nearly four years have gone since these declarations have been made, and we have really made no progress. Those four years have gone and no rural-credit bill is before the House. If I were really partisan on this matter, I would be very glad, indeed, for the majority of this House to report no rural-credit bill, much less to pass one. If I wanted simply to criticize the Democratic Party, that would be my position; but, my friends, I would not injure the farmers of this country, I would not injure the great industry of agriculture simply that I might inflict punishment upon the Democratic Party, even if by so doing I could defeat the Democratic Party. I am sincerely in favor of this legislation. I promise the Democratic majority in the House that if you will pass a proper rural-credit bill this session I will go back in my district and give you credit for your work. But I will tell you now you are in imminent danger if you do not enact such legislation. If you do not redeem your promises to the farmers you should be defeated.

Mr. Chairman, I have made every reasonable effort to secure legislation that would bring relief to the farmers of the United States. I voted against the bill to reform the banking and currency system as a protest against what I thought was an injustice to the farmers. When that bill was before the House I offered an amendment authorizing the organization of national rural banks, "to provide the farmers of the United States with better credit, cheaper interest, and larger capital with which to develop the agriculture of the United States." This amendment is shown in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of September 17, 1913, page 5442. My amendment was voted down. This was the first session of the Sixty-third Congress. Then followed the second session of the Sixty-third Congress, which began the first Monday in December, 1913, and continued until late in October, 1914. Here was an 11-month session. It is strange time could not have been found during this long session—probably without precedent—for rural credit legislation.

On the 14th of July, 1914, I addressed the House on the subject of farm credits. This was the second session of the Sixty-third Congress. I could foresee then the possibility of long delay in the enactment of rural credit legislation. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 14, 1914, page 12109, shows that I spoke as follows:

> This session of Congress is drawing to a close. It is generally understood no rural credit bill will be reported at this session of Congress. The short session of next winter will expire in three months by limitation of law. It will be crowded with other business. Rural credit bills will have little chance for consideration. Unless called in special session, the Sixty-fourth Congress will not convene until in December, 1915. Under the program outlined by the party in power, what reasonable prospect is there of rural credit legislation until late in the year 1916?

My prediction that if Congress did not act during the second session of the Sixty-third Congress that there would be no rural credit legislation until late in 1916 has come true. Then came the third session of the Sixty-third Congress, known as the short session. It began the first Monday in December, 1914, and expired by limitation of law March 4, 1915. I soon saw that there would be no rural credit legislation at that session. As the Sixty-third Congress would end March 4, 1915, and as the first regular session of the Sixty-fourth Congress would not convene until December 7, 1915, it occurred to me a special session of the Sixty-fourth Congress should be called to consider rural credit bills. In order to bring this to the attention of the President and the Congress and the country, on the 23d day of February, 1915, I introduced in the House a resolution calling for an extra session of Congress for the consideration of rural credit legislation. The resolution is printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 23, 1915, page 2191, as follows:

> Concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 58) declaring for a special session of the Sixty-fourth Congress to consider rural-credit legislation.
> Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That should the Sixty-third Congress adjourn sine die without having enacted proper rural-credit legislation, it is hereby declared to be the sense of the Congress that the Sixty-fourth Congress should be convened in extraordinary session at an early date to consider the subject of agricultural credits, with a view to enacting laws which will provide the farmers of the United States at the earliest date possible with better credit and cheaper interest.

Following the introduction of the resolution, I made some remarks urging an extra session of the Sixty-fourth Congress to consider rural-credit legislation. In these remarks, as shown by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 23, 1915, pages 2191 and 2192, I said:

I am in favor of an extra session of Congress for the consideration of rural-credit legislation. I believe it is my duty to use all appropriate means in my power to bring this about.

There is no certainty that the Sixty-fourth Congress in the entire two years of its existence will enact rural-credit legislation unless called in special session for that purpose. Should Congress adjourn the 4th of March, unless called in extra session, it will not convene until the 6th day of December following. Nine months of valuable time will intervene between the final adjournment of this Congress and the convening of the first regular session of the Sixty-fourth Congress. This is too much time for Congress to remain idle when there is important legislation pending of such vital interest to the greatest industry of our land and to the farmers of the United States, who constitute about 40 per cent of our population.

I therefore urge the leaders of the majority in this House, I appeal to those who speak for the administration in power, I ask those who represent the Democratic Party of the Nation, upon which the responsibility of legislation rests, to exert their influence and use every proper and legitimate means within their power to have the Sixty-fourth Congress convened in an extraordinary session at the earliest date possible for the purpose of adopting some system, some policy, some method or means to provide proper agricultural credit for this country and to give our farmers access to the great fountains of credit, now unhappily largely controlled, dominated, and monopolized by our great manufacturing, commercial, and transportation interests.

This is not all. I have endeavored to study the subject of rural credits with a view to equipping myself to do my part toward establishing the very best system of farm credits. I confess that I am partial toward the farmers. I acknowledge that my highest purpose is to serve them. But this does not mean that I would injure those engaged in other occupations. Far from it. The more I study the economic questions of our country, the more profoundly I am convinced that agriculture is the basis of all our wealth, and through its prosperity all other business will prosper. I have introduced a number of rural-credit bills. I introduced one in the Sixty-third Congress, which I believe if enacted into law would have given satisfactory results. I have introduced another bill at this session of Congress. As my time is limited I can not discuss generally the provisions of pending rural-credit bills. I will state briefly some of the provisions of the bill I introduced at this session of Congress—H. R. 10310.

OUTLINE OF HOUSE BILL 10310.

It is a comprehensive measure covering 68 pages of printed matter. The country is divided into 12 districts. In each district a Federal land bank is established. These 12 banks are united in a central institution called the united Federal land bank. All loans are made by the district land banks. Farm-mortgage bonds, through the sale of which district banks obtain funds with which to make loans, are issued only by the central bank. Each Federal land bank is responsible for the bonds and other liabilities of all other Federal land banks. This centralizes the system and makes the bonds of one bank as safe as any other. This gives them equal credit. This insures equal credit facilities and uniform interest rates to the farmers in all sections of the country. By this system the farmers of the West and southwest may borrow money on their farms at as low a rate of interest as may be secured by farmers in the Central or Eastern States. Provision is made for the accumulation of a total reserve equal to 10 per cent of the outstanding bonds of every bank, thus establishing a system of land credit as sound and secure as has ever been established in the world. The bonds issued will be as secure and safe as United States Government bonds. The bill provides that the rate of interest on farm loans, including annual payments on the principal and all other charges, shall not exceed 5 per cent per annum. Each Federal land bank is required to have an operating capital of $1,000,000, one-half of which is contributed by the United States Government. In addition to this the Government contributes $500,000 to the guaranty fund of each Federal land bank. Each borrower, through his interest payment, contributes one-fourth of 1 per cent on the face of his loan annually to the guaranty fund. The borrowers in each county are organized in local associations for mutual assistance and to aid the banks in the administration of their business, but not to make loans to borrowers. Only one-twentieth of the stock in the Federal land bank can be held by private parties. The Federal Government and the borrowers control the election of two-thirds of the directors. No dividends are paid on Government stock and the profits of the bank revert to the borrowers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I suggest the absence of a quorum, but I will withhold that to inquire how long the gentleman intends to continue to-night?

Mr. HELM. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE] is anxious to get recognition for a few minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. For how long?

Mr. EAGLE. For 10 minutes. However, I can yield, if the gentleman is anxious to adjourn.

Mr. STAFFORD. I desire to know of the gentleman, because we would not want to run interminably, because we have to meet to-morrow at 10.30, and we have some office work to do. I will withhold the motion.

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that he may have the right to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, why will not the chairman of the committee gain recognition and yield the gentleman 10 minutes?

Mr. HELM. It is not on a matter connected with this bill, as I understand it.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman can yield the time.

Mr. HELM. It is the same kind of a proposition that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] had.

Mr. STAFFORD. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Chairman, I can not at all suppose the things that are in my mind to say will be of very great importance at this time; and yet because the observations in the main, and especially the spirit that was back of the observations, of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] so entirely accord with my own idea of what ought to be said about this matter that I want, instead of differing from him, briefly to say a few things in line with what he has been saying.

Certainly I am not meaning to criticize my own party—the Democratic Party—for not having already brought out a rural-credit bill. Great and pressing problems have been constantly before the Congress for its consideration. As a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, I am as well aware as anybody else of the enormous amount of labor which the preparation of even a fairly good rural-credits bill will entail, so as to make it stand the criticisms of gentlemen of our own party and the opposition party, and especially to meet the approbation of the vast numbers of persons who have great interest in such a measure, to wit, the farming and producing classes of this Nation. And I can add with great sincerity and perfect good faith that, so far as I know or believe, every man on the Banking and Currency Committee since this Congress met has thoroughly considered this question and has intelligently discussed it in an effort to bring forth a bill which will have some substantial merit to it.

From my own point of view, I think nothing during the Sixty-third or the Sixty-fourth Congresses, in so far as it affects the domestic peace and permanent prosperity of the entire mass of our people, is of so much importance fundamentally as a proper system of rural credits. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that all men who will study the history of all nations in all times past, wherein a written history of their doings and internal life is recorded, must agree upon this, that either by a deliberate policy of national law, in our country as in all other countries, or else by the working out of economic conditions and policies, and in our country notably since the Civil War, those who produce every year the wealth of the Nation, by daily labor and upon the farm, have been allowed to retain of the wealth they produce only enough to afford a mere subsistence for another year; while the vast bulk of the wealth they annually produce passes from them to the middle man and more fortunate classes. It seems through all the long ages of the past to have been a favorite idea of statesmanship to keep the producing masses poor and uneducated—a theory that is repugnant to the spirit and object of a Republic such as we enjoy.

I submit that the surest way that a nation can be great and noble, under God's providence, is that universal prosperity and universal education be the rule instead of class wealth and class education.

In my own great State of Texas, where 5,000,000 people dwell upon, perhaps, the richest soil in the world—and as good a people as perhaps ever assembled in one State at one time in the history of the world—those who are producing out of the earth the annual increase of wealth of my State are not allowed, by virtue either of law or the working out of economic conditions, to retain out of their annual earnings enough of the wealth they annually produce to be just and equitable. And so I believe it is in every State of this Union. And I believe it is the noblest duty of statesmanship at this hour to see to it that, while we do nothing to hinder capital upon its proper course, we prevent capital from wrecking labor and despoiling it of its due reward. It behooves this Congress to see to it that men are not driven off of the farm because the life is unattractive, but that we establish a just and comprehensive rural-credits law, under which home owning and home building upon the farm may be encouraged, because under right conditions the life and the rewards of farm life are and will always be not only sensible and moral but productive and culture making, and ennobling. The ownership of the farm is the thing that will do that; and under modern conditions, without rural-credit legislation, you can never accomplish universally that desirable result throughout all portions of our country.

So, for one, from the beginning of my brief career three years ago in Congress, I have been, and am now, and shall be, zealous to see to it that a rural-credits bill, even if not as good as I should wish but still a bill which has attached to it the name of "rural credits," with the backing of this mighty Nation, may be perfected and reported out and be considered and passed by the Congress.

There is no other thing we can do that will in an equal degree lend hope and courage and impetus and give as much happiness to as many people throughout this great country—to those who toil—as to give them a just and comprehensive rural-credits bill under which the man in debt for his land may secure long time and easy terms in its payment, and the man without land may secure a permanent foothold upon the soil as its owner. Let us give such useful citizen a chance to get hold of and keep a piece of land that shall be the place where he can rear and educate his children in peace and prosperity and dwell permanently in happiness, and which attaches him and his descendants to that soil by virtue of his and their choice, and not by virtue of his and their necessities. [Applause.]

Let us unite in one common impulse and demand action that will result at this session in the enactment of a rural-credits bill; and all of us may be very sure that we will be furthering the cause of good citizenship, of broader education, of happier hearthstones, and that millions of hearts scattered everywhere all over this broad land will be glad that thus we have served well in our day.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri having, as Speaker pro tempore, assumed the chair, Mr. DOREMUS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House joint resolution 103, and had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of woman suffrage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arizona asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed the Indian appropriation bill, with Senate amendments numbered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to have printed the Indian appropriation bill, with the Senate amendments numbered. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, do I understand that the bill has been returned to the House with Senate amendments?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes. It is returned to the House and is on the Speaker's table.

Mr. STAFFORD. It has not been referred yet to a conference?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. No.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned, in accordance with the order previously made, until to-morrow, Thursday, March 30, 1916, at 10.30 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting recommendations in regard to certain changes in laws relating to payment of patent fees and the refund of excess payments effected by amending sections 4935 and 4936 of the Revised Statutes (H. Doc. No. 965); to the Committee on Patents and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Acting Secretary of State submitting an estimate of appropriation for the share of the United States for the calendar year 1917, as a party to the International Radiotelegraphic Convention heretofore signed, of the expenses of the radiotelegraphic service of the International Bureau of the Telegraphic Union at Berne, Switzerland (H. Doc. No. 966); to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting draft of amendment of the estimate of appropriation for "General expenses of public buildings," to be found in lines 12 to 16 on page 533, Book of Estimates, 1917 (H. Doc. No. 967); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting draft of a proposed bill to authorize and direct the Secretary of the Treasury to enlarge, extend, remodel, and improve the Federal building at Warren, Ohio, for the better accommodation of the post office and other governmental offices (H. Doc. No. 968); to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bill and resolution were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. McCLINTIC, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8492) to restore homestead rights in certain cases, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 451), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. KENT, from the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions, to which was referred the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 21) authorizing the appointment of a representative of the United States Government to appear at the celebration of the landing of Sir Francis Drake on the coast of California, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 452); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. GANDY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9912) validating certain applications for and entries of public lands, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 453); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 30, 1916.

Rev. A. C. Millar, D. D., of Little Rock, Ark., offered the following prayer:

O God, our fathers' guide,
Cast not their sons aside,
Though they be dust.
Hold with Thy mighty hand;
Bless and protect our land;
In Thee we trust.

Thou hast pursued us with plenty and with prosperity, and Thou hast protected us and helped us hitherto, not because of our merit but because of Thy loving-kindness. Thou hast trusted us, and we pray that Thou wouldst continue to trust and help us to be worthy of Thy confidence.

We pray Thy blessing, our heavenly Father, upon the embattled nations as from the ensanguined soil sobs and sighs and sorrow ascend unto Thee. We pray that Thou wouldst have mercy upon them; and help us in this time of trial and of tragedy that we may be true to the trust that has been committed to us. May we not be craven, but may we have courage to do that which is right in Thy sight. As we seek Thy mercy, help us to be merciful. As we seek Thy patience, may we be patient. As we seek Thy justice, may we be just. As we would have Thy loving favor, may we love humanity.

Bless these men who have the destiny not only of the Nation but of the world in their hands, and may they realize that they represent not simply their States but the Nation and humanity and Thee, and may they be loyal to truth and righteousness.

We ask this in the name of our Elder Brother and for the sake of Thy sinless Son of Sorrow. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Tuesday, March 28, 1916, when, on request of Mr. JAMES, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MILITARY TRAINING IN CIVIL LIFE (S. DOC. NO. 380).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a memorandum submitted by The Adjutant General of the Army in response to a resolution of the 22d instant calling for a statement showing the number of persons in the United States in civil life who have received military training within the last 10 years, which was ordered to lie on the table, and, on motion of Mr. LODGE, was ordered to be printed as a public document and also to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 27, 1916.

PRESIDENT UNITED STATES SENATE.

SIR: In compliance with the provisions of Senate resolution of March 22, 1916, I have the honor to transmit herewith a memorandum prepared by The Adjutant General of the Army. The resolution referred to is quoted in the memorandum.

Very respectfully,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE.

(Memorandum for the Secretary of War.)

The following statement is submitted in answer to the Senate resolution of March 22, 1916, that—

"The Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate a statement, to be prepared by The Adjutant General of the Army, showing approximately the number of persons in the United States in civil life who have received a military training within the last 10 years, as follows:

"First. Men who have served at least one full enlistment in the Regular Army.

"Second. Men who have served at least one full enlistment in the National Guard.

"Third. Graduates of educational institutions which provide an adequate military training."

There are approximately 67,765 men now alive who left the Regular Army during the 10 years 1906–1915 after having served three or more years. Included in that total are 6,893 men who went into civil life without terminating their services honorably. They either deserted and did not return to service or were discharged by sentence of a general court-martial.

The number of men discharged on account of disability after a service of three or more years is not included in this estimate, because the number is small, and of the number so discharged only a small proportion is fit for military service of any kind.

This estimate is based on the actual number of men discharged during the period mentioned, but in some cases it has been found necessary to approximate the number of men who served three years before being separated from service. For example, the actual number of men discharged by purchase during the past 10 years is shown by the records of The Adjutant General's Office, but no compilation has ever been made showing how many of them had served three or more years before discharge; and an examination of many thousands of individual records would be necessary before such a compilation could be made. However, an examination of the records for the year 1915 was made and it was ascertained that a little over 50 per cent of the total number of men discharged by purchase during that year had served more than three years before discharge, and this percentage was applied to discharges by purchase during the other years covered by this estimate, as it is reasonable to assume that what is true of one year with respect to these cases is relatively true of the other years.

A deduction of 1 per cent per annum from those who passed into civil life is made to cover casualties, except in the cases of retired men, to whom a death rate of 4.5 per cent is applied. This latter death rate is the approximate death rate of men on the retired list.

Some of the men who have been discharged from the Army no doubt have enlisted in the Navy and Marine Corps, but there are no data available in this department from which the approximate number so enlisted can be obtained.

The men discharged from the Philippine Scouts are not included in the figures before given.

The number of men discharged from the Organized Militia after a service of three years or more and who were not reenlisted are shown by the records of the War Department for the years 1911 to 1914, inclusive, but are not shown for the years 1905 to 1910, inclusive, although the enlisted strength is shown. The figures for 1915 have not been compiled. The number discharged during the years 1905–1910 are estimated on the basis of the average ratio between the total enlisted strength and discharges during the years for which data are obtainable.

The number of men now living who were discharged from the militia during the 10 years mentioned, after a service of 3 years or more, is approximately 124,405. As before stated, figures for 1915 are not yet available, but if the number of discharges during that year is as great as the average number during the period 1912 to 1914, inclusive, the number now living who were discharged during the past 10 years would be about 126,400. This difference is caused by the fact that the number of discharges in 1915 should be about 2,000 greater than the number in 1905.

There are approximately 40,317 men now living who have been graduated during the past 10 years from civil educational institutions at which officers of the Army were detailed as instructors of military science and tactics.

A deduction of 1 per cent per annum is made for casualties.

No estimate is made of the number of graduates from public and private high schools that have military drill, as there is some question as to the adequacy of military training thus provided.

Summary.

From Regular Army	67,765
From Organized Militia	126,400
From schools at which officers of Army are detailed as instructors	40,317
Total	234,482

H. P. McCAIN,
The Adjutant General.

MARCH 27, 1916.

DAUGHTERS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, transmitting, pursuant to law, the annual report of the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution for the year ended October 11, 1915. The communication and accompanying papers and illustrations will be referred to the Committee on Printing for action.

FINDINGS OF THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate communications from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting certified copies of the findings of fact and conclusions filed by the court in the following causes:

Daniel D. Downs v. The United States (S. Doc. No. 384);

Wilt Rippey v. The United States (S. Doc. No. 383); and Henry J. Wiggins v. The United States (S. Doc. No. 385).

The foregoing findings were, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill:

S. 4657. An act to authorize the Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railway Co. to rebuild and reconstruct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Tennessee River near Chattanooga, in Hamilton County, in the State of Tennessee.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 4767. An act authorizing the Director of the Census to collect and publish statistics of cotton seed and cottonseed products; and

H. J. Res. 79. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of Labor to permit the South Carolina Naval Militia to use the Charleston immigration station and dock connected therewith.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 10037. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 11078. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; and

H. J. Res. 68. Joint resolution to cede to the State of Maryland temporary jurisdiction over certain lands in the Fort McHenry Military Reservation.

PRODUCTION OF NITRIC ACID.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, when the proper order is reached this morning I propose to introduce a bill, which is explained very largely by a letter to the Secretary of War which I hold in my hand and one to me accompanying that communication. In view of the introduction of that bill, which is of great importance and looks to the production in this country of a sufficient amount of nitric acid to supply our needs at all times, in war as well as peace, I ask that the communications which I send to the desk may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read as follows:

E. I. DU PONT DE NEMOURS & CO.,
Wilmington, Del., March 28, 1916.

Hon. WILLARD SAULSBURY,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The question of fixation of atmospheric nitrogen for the production of nitric acid—in order that the United States may be free from other countries in obtaining this essential raw material for the production of explosives—has occupied the attention of our company for a number of years; but it was not until about a year ago that we were able to make definite plans toward the acquisition of a process known to be satisfactory. This process now in commercial use in Norway, requires a large quantity of cheap water power. Just prior to the breaking out of the European war our company was in negotiation for the acquisition of water-power rights in Canada, but the war has brought us to realize that a Canadian installation would not be desirable from the point of view of the United States Government, and it would also be questionable from the commercial standpoint. In order that the development of water powers in the United States may be made more practical, we have prepared a draft of a bill, copy inclosed. This bill, as you see, makes it possible for the Secretary of War to arrange for leasing water powers for the purpose of providing a supply of nitric acid. I take this first opportunity to call your attention to the question with the assurance that we will give you all the information at our command, so that you may acquire a proper insight into the problem. Please call upon us for any information that you may need. Further, I am taking the liberty of forwarding a copy of the bill and this letter to Hon. GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Very sincerely,

E. I. DU PONT DE NEMOURS & CO.,
PIERRE S. DU PONT, President.

MARCH 28, 1916.

Hon. NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War, War Department, Washington, D. C.

SIR: On frequent occasions during recent years Gen. Crozier has called our attention to the menace involved by our dependence on foreign nations for our raw materials for nitric-acid supply, this commodity being absolutely essential in the manufacture of smokeless powder and other explosives and in great demand as an essential in the manufacture of fertilizers.

Several years ago the fixation of nitrogen from the air by the use of electric arc was found practical abroad, and, with a view of implanting the industry in this country—solving our problem here at home—the Du Pont Co. sent a corps of its experts to Europe to thoroughly investigate the various processes there employed.

As a result of these investigations the Du Pont Co. purchased the right of one of the leading processes used abroad, which process is now established in Europe on a commercial basis on a large scale of production.

As you know, the process of securing nitric acid from the air requires large units of hydroelectric power at a very low cost.

Coincident with our investigations abroad we have been studying the possibilities for satisfactory hydroelectric power in the United States, and we find that while the power physically exists, it is not available because of governmental restrictions.

I inclose herewith for your consideration a tentative draft of a bill which, we believe, will protect the public interests and justify the investment of the capital essential to the solution of this problem in the United States.

You will note the bill we submit provides that the company "shall deliver to the United States for military or naval purposes all or any part of the output of nitric acid at a price which shall include such profit as the Secretary of War shall determine to be reasonable."

With the way made clear, the Du Pont Co. stands ready to negotiate a contract under which they will begin at once the construction of a plant in units of such magnitude as may be agreed upon between the Government and the Du Pont Co., the Du Pont Co. to furnish the capital.

Should you desire to confer with me on any of the phases of this question, I will be pleased to make a trip to Washington at your pleasure.

Very truly, yours,

——— ———, President.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Who signs these communications?

The SECRETARY. The original communication is signed by the president of the Du Pont de Nemours Co. The second communication is a copy unsigned.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I did not catch whether there was in the letter a proposition which appears in a note in the Post this morning, where it says that the Secretary of War, Mr. Baker, received a letter from Mr. du Pont, the president of the company, touching a proposed bill to provide for a 50-year lease of water power, and in return to give the Government powder essential for the Government's needs, and in the meantime to use the water power for whatever purpose they may see fit.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think it may not be inexpedient to suggest that there is a very large plant in my State which, perhaps, might be secured. We have been laboring under a great many difficulties for a long time. The Government has done everything to the project up to date except to dynamite it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, one or two Senators have suggested that they would be very glad to hear the bill read to which the communications refer. It was my intention to suggest that the bill be printed in the RECORD when we reach that order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The communications will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SAULSBURY subsequently said: Mr. President, there has been considerable interest manifested in the bill which I hold in my hand and which I am about to introduce. I have been requested by several Senators much interested in the subject to have the bill read. As I have not a sufficient number of copies, so that Senators may examine it and understand it fully, particularly the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who is to address the Senate on the subject this morning, I ask that the bill which I send to the desk be read and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (S. 5316) to provide for a supply of nitric acid available for the national defense through utilization of water power was read the first time by its title and the second time at length and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to provide for the construction and operation of works for the production of nitric acid available for the national defense the Secretary of War is authorized, upon the recommendation and approval of the board of engineers hereinafter provided for, to grant permits for the construction of dams, storage and diversion works, or other structures for creation of hydroelectric power in or across any of the navigable or boundary waters of the United States or in or across any of the streams upon public lands upon terms and conditions not inconsistent with the treaty or other obligations of the United States, and with the rights and obligations hereinafter set forth.

SEC. 2. All such permits shall provide (a) that the grantee shall construct works to be operated by such hydroelectric power for the fixation of nitrogen for the manufacture of nitric acid, such works to have an initial capacity to be fixed by the Secretary of War upon the recommendation and approval of said board of engineers, and to be built according to plans approved by said board of engineers and the Secretary of War; (b) that at all times upon request of the Secretary of War the grantee shall deliver to the United States for military or naval purposes all or any part of the output of nitric acid at a price which shall include such profit as the Secretary of War shall determine to be reasonable, and his determination of the reasonableness of such profit shall be final, and for this object the Secretary may direct the works to be operated to such extent of their capacity as he deems necessary for the purposes of the United States; (c) all such dams, storage or diversion works, or other hydroelectric structures shall be of such design and capacity for present or future use as the Secretary of War shall approve, and after approval of the plans no deviation therefrom shall be made without the approval of the Secretary of War; (d) that such permit shall not be assignable without the written consent of the Secretary of War except as security for bonds issued by the grantee to raise funds for the construction of such works.

SEC. 3. All such permits shall be for the terms of 50 years, and may be renewed for like periods, and if not renewed at the end of any period shall continue in force until the property is taken over and paid for by the United States as hereinafter provided for. In case of any violation of the conditions specified in said permit, and such violation shall continue for 90 days after notice from the Secretary of War to cure such default, such permit may be revoked by decree of United States court. At the end of any period the United States shall have the right to take over all said works and hydroelectric plant upon payment of the fair value thereof, not including therein the value of any rights granted hereunder.

SEC. 4. The grantee named in any such permit is authorized to erect, maintain, and operate the hydroelectric plant and works aforesaid which are hereby declared to be necessary for the purposes of the national defense, and may use or divert such waters as may be necessary for the operation of said hydroelectric plant. Such grantee may occupy any public lands necessary for the hydroelectric plant and works aforesaid and their appurtenances, and may take and use any lands or other property necessary for said hydroelectric plant by exercise of the right of eminent domain in the district court of the United States where said property is located, under the laws of the State where such property is located, and in the absence of such laws, then under the laws of the United States for the condemnation of property for navigation purposes.

SEC. 5. All such works shall be constructed under the supervision of an engineer officer of the United States Army designated for that purpose, and shall be completed within the time specified in the permit by the Secretary of War, unless the same is extended by him for good cause. Any power developed and not needed for the operation of the nitric acid works aforesaid and any capacity of said nitric acid works not requisitioned by order of the Secretary of War may be employed by the grantee in any way he may elect, but subject, however, at all times to the right of the United States to requisition the same for use in the production of nitric acid for military or naval purposes whenever so requested by the Secretary of War. If the Secretary of War deems it advisable in order to promote the economical operation of the nitric acid plant or to accomplish the objects of this act, he may include in such permit authority for the grantee to use or divert any additional amount of water for which the grantee has or shall secure rights under the laws of the State or States where such use or diversion occurs, the additional power developed may be used by the grantee as provided in this section: Provided, however, That the cost to the consumer of any power not used by the grantee and sold for general domestic consumption shall be subject to State regulation as to price and service by the duly constituted authority of the State in which such power is consumed, and in the absence of such authority by the Secretary of War of the United States. If the United States shall take over the plant and hydroelectric works as hereinbefore provided for, the grantee shall be paid the fair value of all property dependent for its usefulness upon being operated in connection with the property taken over.

SEC. 6. The board of engineers herein provided for shall consist of the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance, the Judge Advocate General, and two engineer officers of the United States Army with the rank of colonel, designated by the Chief of Engineers and approved by the Secretary of War.

Mr. KENYON subsequently said: I should like to inquire of the Senator from Delaware, who introduced the bill, if it is the bill referred to in the correspondence which was read this morning—the bill prepared by the powder company for the Senator?

Mr. SAULSBURY. It is the bill which was inclosed with the communications which I had read.

Mr. KENYON. Which, I understand, is a bill prepared by the powder company?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Yes; I so understand.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, as this matter is getting before the Senate, I think it would be well at this time to have read the bill which was reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry this morning bearing on the same question, and I ask that that be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I inquire of the Senator from Iowa if it would not be satisfactory to have the bill to which he refers printed in the RECORD, so that the two bills may be seen side by side? I do not, however, object to his request.

Mr. KENYON. We have had a bill read which has been presented by the powder company; and it seems to me it would be well to have read the bill which has been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I do not propose to object to the Senator's request.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa whether the bill to which he refers includes the amendments made by the committee?

Mr. KENYON. It does.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill referred to by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON].

Mr. KENYON. Was the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania that the bills ought to be printed in the RECORD together?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes; the bill to which the Senator from Iowa refers and the bill which has just been read.

Mr. KENYON. I think that is a good suggestion.

Mr. OLIVER. My idea was to avoid occupying the time of the Senate which would be consumed in the reading of the bill.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to have the reported bill read.

Mr. OLIVER. Very well.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I ask that the Secretary read the copy of the bill which I reported, which is the committee print, and which embraces all the amendments agreed upon by the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

A bill (S. 4971) to authorize the designation and withdrawal of water-power sites and the construction of water-power and other plants by the United States for the manufacture of nitrates, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the President at any time, in his discretion, may, by Executive order, designate for the exclusive use of the United States any site upon a navigable river, the improvement of which for purposes of navigation will make available at such site surplus water power over and above the needs for navigation. After being so designated, and until the designation is modified or revoked, every such site shall be developed and improved only in the manner and for the purposes authorized by this act.

SEC. 2. That the President may also at any time, in his discretion, withdraw from settlement, location, sale, or entry and reserve for the exclusive use of the United States any public lands of the United States, including the Territory of Alaska, whether within national forests or other reservations or withdrawals, which are valuable as water-power sites for the purposes of this act: Provided, That not more than five sites shall be withdrawn in pursuance of the authority given by this act.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to investigate and to recommend for designation or withdrawal such dam sites, water-power sites as in his opinion will be necessary for carrying out the purposes of this act, and is further authorized to construct, maintain, and operate at or on any site so designated or withdrawn, dams, locks, other improvements to navigation, power houses, and other plants and equipment necessary or convenient for the generation of electrical or other power and for the production of nitrates or other products needed for munitions of war and useful in the manufacture of fertilizers: Provided, That all plans and specifications for dams in navigable rivers shall be submitted to and approved by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of War is authorized to lease, purchase, or acquire, by condemnation, gift, or devise, such lands and rights of way as may be necessary for the construction and operation of such plants and to take from any lands of the United States, or to purchase or acquire by condemnation, materials and minerals necessary for the construction or operation of such plants and for the manufacture of such products.

SEC. 5. That the products of such plants shall be used by the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy for military or naval purposes, and any surplus not so required may be sold and disposed of by the Secretary of Agriculture under such regulations as he may prescribe.

SEC. 6. That the sum of $15,000,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, available until expended, to enable the Secretary of War to carry out the purposes of this act.

SEC. 7. That the plant or plants provided for under this act shall be constructed and operated solely by the Government and not in conjunction with any other industry or enterprise carried on by private capital.

SEC. 8. That in order to raise the money appropriated by this act and necessary to carry its provisions into effect, the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the request of the Secretary of War and the approval of the President, may issue and sell or use for such purchase or construction hereinabove authorized any of the bonds of the United States now available in the Treasury of the United States under the act of August 5, 1909, the act of February 4, 1910, and the act of March 2, 1911, relating to the issue of bonds for the construction of the Panama Canal, to a total amount not to exceed $15,000,000: Provided, That any Panama Canal bonds issued and sold or used under the provisions of this section may be made payable at such time after issue as the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, may deem advisable and fix, instead of 50 years after date of issue, as in said act of August 5, 1909, not exceeding 50 years.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented the memorial of C. K. Stinson, of Gardner, Mass., remonstrating against a reduction in the maximum of parcel-post packages, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. THOMPSON presented petitions of sundry citizens of Kansas, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Garden City and Longton, in the State of Kansas, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to limit the freedom of the press, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Kansas, remonstrating against any change in the parcel-post law, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Garnett, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation to grant pensions to employees of the Postal Service, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota presented a petition of the History Club, of Sioux Falls, S. Dak., and a petition of the Study Club, of Britton, S. Dak., praying for an investigation into conditions surrounding the marketing of dairy products, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a memorial of Jefferson Grange, No. 133, Patrons of Husbandry, of Coleman, S. Dak., remonstrating against an increase in armaments, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Jefferson Grange, No. 133, Patrons of Husbandry, of Coleman, S. Dak., and a petition of Prosperity Grange. No. 119, Patrons of Husbandry, of White, S. Dak., praying for Government ownership of telegraph, telephone, and wireless systems, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented petitions of sundry inhabitants of the Hawaiian Islands, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LODGE. I present resolutions adopted by the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, relative to the conditions of destitution in Poland and to the entry of food therein. I ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS, 1916.

Resolutions relative to the conditions of destitution in Poland and to the entry of food therein.

Whereas according to reliable information the situation in the belligerent countries of Europe is such that the inhabitants of Poland and the invaded districts of Russia are dying of starvation; and

Whereas it has been authoritatively presented that the only solution for this problem is to increase the available food supply in said territory from outside sources through the medium of an organization similar to the present commission for the relief of Belgium: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Massachusetts are hereby requested to take early and concerted action to bring before the United States Department of State the awful plight of the inhabitants of these districts, with a view to having representations made to the Governments of the belligerent nations that the importation of foodstuffs therein be made possible.

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions, attested by the Secretary of the Commonwealth, be sent by said official to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Massachusetts.

In the house of representatives, adopted, March 17, 1916.

In senate, adopted, in concurrence, March 22, 1916.

A true copy.

Attest:

ALBERT P. LANGTRY,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

Mr. DU PONT. I present resolutions adopted at a meeting of the Society of Colonial Wars in the District of Columbia, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MARCH 25, 1916.

To the honorable the SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

GENTLEMEN: At a meeting of the Society of Colonial Wars in the District of Columbia, held on December 7, 1915, the following resolutions were passed:

"Resolved, That the Society of Colonial Wars in the District of Columbia is of the opinion that, commendable as are the perpetuation and celebration of the achievements of our ancestors, we should be unworthy descendants if we do not take inspiration from them, and therefore action, to safeguard to the best of our ability the heritage handed down to us; be it accordingly

"Resolved, That the outgoing governor of this society be, and is hereby, empowered to appoint a committee of five members charged to draft suitable resolutions memorializing the President and the Congress of the United States, and urging the imperative necessity of such legislation as will insure to our beloved country thorough defense, both on land and on sea; and be it further

"Resolved, That these resolutions be communicated to the General Society of the Colonial Wars and to every State society, and that each be urged to pass similar resolutions, and that the members thereof be exhorted to exercise both collectively and as individuals, such influence in their respective communities and upon their Senators and Representatives in Congress, that the proper strength and organization may be given to American land and naval forces."

The undersigned, having been appointed a committee to draft memorials in pursuance of the above resolutions, respectfully petition you that in our opinion the American people desire that the proper officials of the Government and the Senators and Representatives in Congress should take such action that our country will be thoroughly prepared to defend itself both on land and sea. We are strongly of the opinion that the American people stand ready to make the necessary sacrifices in order that our military and naval forces may be so strengthened, organized, equipped, and supplied as to be able to withstand any enemy or enemies which would venture to attack us.

We respectfully direct your attention to the principles enunciated by the Hon. John C. Calhoun, in December, 1820, in which he said:

"If our liberty should ever be endangered by the military power gaining the ascendency, it will be from the necessity of making those mighty and irregular efforts to retrieve our affairs after a series of disasters caused by the want of adequate military knowledge, just as in our physical system a state of the most dangerous excitement and paroxysm follows that of the greatest debility and prostration. To avoid these dangerous consequences, and to prepare the country to meet a state of war, particularly at its commencement, with honor and safety, much must depend on the organization of our military peace establishment. * * *

"To give such an organization the leading principles in its formation ought to be that at the commencement of hostilities there should be nothing either to new model or create. The only difference, consequently, between the peace and war formations of the Army ought to be in the increased magnitude of the latter, and the only change in passing from the former to the latter should consist in giving to it the augmentation which will then be necessary.

"It is thus, and thus only, the dangerous transitition from peace to war may be made without confusion or disorder, and the wakness and danger which otherwise would be inevitable be avoided."

Thus far in our national career such a desideratum has never been attained and, in consequence, all of our wars have been marked by mismanagement, by the loss of life and by financial cost, both colossal and utterly unjustifiable. Assuredly it is high time to institute measures which shall preclude the repetition of the shortsighted policy so persistently followed in the past.

We should, indeed, be unworthy descendants if we failed to do our utmost to safeguard the heritage bequeathed to us by former generations which did not shrink to make every sacrifice, whereby this country has attained its present greatness.

We accordingly most earnestly and respectfully petition you to exercise to the utmost the power vested in you in order that this precious heritage may not be jeopardized through negligence or indifference, and that your body, whose duty it is, will provide our beloved country with thorough defense.

We have the honor to be, your very obedient servants,

FREDERIC L. HUIDEKOPER,
Chairman.
FREDERIC BULKELEY HYDE.
IRA WARREN DENNISON.
WILLIAM VAN ZANDT COX.
JOB BARNARD.

Mr. BORAH presented petitions of sundry citizens of Hope, Sandpoint, Juliaetta, Bonners Ferry, Grangeville, Cambridge, Orofino, Fraser, Greenleaf, and Plummer, all in the State of Idaho, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Idaho, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation for compulsory Sunday observance in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Chair will indulge me for a moment, I have some petitions here that should be sent to the Committee on Military Affairs. They bear the names of several hundred workmen in four factories at Adrian, Mich. I desire to read a few words from this petition:

We, the undersigned workingmen and voters of the city of Adrian, Mich. desire to make known to you our deep convictions on the great question of the day—the question of national preparedness.

We, who will bear the brunt of such action, are determinedly in favor of preparedness against war to the fullest possible degree.

We want a Navy large enough to defend our shores against all comers and an Army big enough to make invasion or aggression by a foreign power too dangerous to be attempted.

We believe in a well-trained and equipped reserve of citizen soldiery embracing all able-bodied male citizens and a federalized National Guard relieved of strike duty.

We ask you to give these matters your careful attention, and assure you that we shall carry these convictions to the polls with us next November.

These petitions are signed entirely by workingmen, and the signatures were obtained through their own voluntary action.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The petitions will lie on the table, the bill having been reported.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have a telegram from Henry M. Leland, president of the Cadillac Automobile Co., indorsing the vocational educational bill with all amendments. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DETROIT, MICH., March 22, 1916.

Hon. WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH,
Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Vocational education bill with its amendments represents best thought of educators and men in industrial life who are closest to problems of providing practical education for our boys and girls. Mr. H. E. Miles, of the Wisconsin State Board of Industrial Education, is perhaps best-informed man in country on this question. I have known him many years. He is educator and manufacturer. He is practical and sane. He is honest and sincere. He is now at New Willard, Washington. If you feel need of further information, may I suggest you either hear Mr. Miles personally or in conference? Some provision for practical education is imperative. Am hopeful for your interest in this measure, perhaps in amendment 6 in particular, and trust you can arrange for a hearing with Mr. Miles.

HENRY M. LELAND.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have a telegram from Mr. Charles H. Lewis, secretary of the Detroit Federation of Labor, in favor of the bill relative to the interstate laws known as the Booher bill, preventing the shipment of convict-made goods. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DETROIT, MICH., March 23, 1916.

Senator WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH,
Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: The Detroit Federation of Labor, representing a large per cent of the workers of this city, respectfully request you to support the bill relative to the interstate law known as the Booher bill, preventing the shipment of convict-made goods from one State to another, as we are unalterably opposed to same.

Respectfully, yours,

CHAS. H. LEWIS, Secretary,
205 Equity Building.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I present a communication from the mayor of the city of Albion, Mich., with reference to the bill for the retiring of Federal employees after long and faithful service. I ask that the communication be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

There being no objection, the communication was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CITY OF ALBION, March 20, 1916.

Hon. WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR:

Whereas a bill has been introduced in the House of Representatives at Washington, D. C., for the retirement of Federal employees after long and faithful service or after disability caused by no fault of the employee; and

Whereas the general public is unaware of the conditions surrounding the employment of men and women in the service of the Government; and

Whereas it is the opinion of those who are acquainted with the facts that there would be a unanimous sentiment throughout the country for a national-retirement law were the public fully acquainted with the conditions as they now exist: Therefore be it

Resolved, That in accordance with the laws now in force in every city of consequence in the United States and in practice with the larger corporations granting retirement with part pay to civil and corporate employees who have served continuously for 25 years, that equal justice should be meted to Federal employees who by reason of a quarter of a century of honorable service or being incapacitated previously in the discharge of duty; and therefore, in a fairness, the undersigned, mayor and council of the city of Albion, Calhoun County, Mich., indorse said bill that all Federal employees may look to their future without apprehension after giving the best years of their lives to the public service: And be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to each of the United States Senators and Representatives of the State of Michigan.

WM. BARNES, Mayor.

Attest:

P. P. NAGLE, City Clerk.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I present resolutions adopted by the Detroit Republican Club, favoring the passage of the bill known as the Penrose-Griffin indefinite-leave-of-absence bill to postal employees. I ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DETROIT, MICH., March 22, 1916.

Hon. WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed you will find copy of the resolution adopted by the Detroit Republican Club.

We trust you will find it possible to use your vote and influence in favor of this bill.

Our club will watch with interest its progress through both Houses.

Yours, very truly,

DETROIT REPUBLICAN CLUB,
JOS. E. STIGLER, Secretary.

Whereas there is now pending before the Post Office Committees, in both branches of the United States Congress, a bill known as the Penrose-Griffin indefinite-leave-of-absence bill, which, if enacted into law, will provide for the retirement of all worn-out Post Office employees in the classified civil service;

Whereas thus far the United States of America is the only large civilized Nation which has made no provision for its worn-out and superannuated employees; and

Whereas it is the sense of the Detroit Republican Club that the said above-mentioned bill should be passed by the United States Congress: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the members of the Detroit Republican Club here assembled do hereby heartily approve and indorse the said bill known in the House of Representatives as H. R. 6915; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of this club be instructed to send a copy of this resolution to each of the United States Senators from the State of Michigan and to each Member of the House of Representatives, and to ask that they give the said bill their aid and support.

SAMUEL F. POLOZKER,
CHARLES C. ASHURST,
FRANK PUDDEFOOT,
Committee on Resolutions.

ARTHUR E. WOOD, President.
JOS. E. STIGLER, Secretary.

Mr. CLAPP presented a petition of the Civic and Commerce Association, of Minneapolis, Minn., praying for liberal appropriations for the maintenance of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a memorial of Elwood Grange, No. 608, Patrons of Husbandry, of Owatonna, Minn., remonstrating against any change in the parcel-post law, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. GRONNA presented a petition of sundry citizens of La Moure, N. Dak., praying for Government ownership of munition plants, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the Farmers' Club of Reeder, N. Dak., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Hollis rural-credit bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of North Dakota, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of North Dakota, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to limit the freedom of the press, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of North Dakota, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to permit the giving out of certain information by the Post Office Department, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. HUGHES presented petitions of sundry citizens of New Jersey, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have received this morning from citizens of my State a short telegram in the nature of a memorial with reference to sectarian appropriations for schools. I wish to say that I understand the Indian appropriation bill carries an appropriation of $250,000 for the erection of buildings for school purposes, looking toward the Government being in a position to dispense with contract schools. I ask that the telegram be read.

There being no objection, the telegram was read, as follows:

MACON, GA., March 29, 1916.

Hon. HOKE SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We petition against sectarian appropriations in Indian bill and for constitutional amendment forbidding all sectarian appropriations and prohibition of same in Philippine and Porto Rico bills.

W. T. Anderson, editor Telegraph; C. A. Cunningham, judge; Bridges Smith, mayor; R. D. Feagin, attorney Law Enforcement League; W. N. Ainsworth, pastor Mulberry Street Methodist Church; W. L. Pickard, president Mercer University.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I am directed by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which was referred the bill (S. 4971) to authorize the designation and withdrawal of water-power sites and the construction of water-power and other plants by the United States for the manufacture of nitrates, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments. I desire to state that I shall submit a report to accompany the bill at a later day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. JONES, from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6057) to amend section 14 of the reclamation-extension act approved August 13, 1914, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 318) thereon.

Mr. OLIVER. On the 20th of this month my colleague [Mr. PENROSE] introduced a bill (S. 5140) to determine what obligation, if any, exists under the treaty with Spain of 1819, to relieve the estate of Richard W. Meade, deceased, and it was referred to the Committee on Claims. I ask that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, inasmuch as it involves the construction of a treaty.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That action will be taken.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. JAMES:

A bill (S. 5317) to extend temporarily the time for filing applications and fees and taking action in the United States Patent Office in favor of nations granting reciprocal rights to United States citizens; to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. GORE:

A bill (S. 5337) to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of Oklahoma; to the Committee on Fisheries.

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 5338) granting an increase of pension to Almira V. De Lane (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

NATIONAL DEFENSE.

Mr. CUMMINS submitted 29 amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 12766) to increase the efficiency of the Military Establishment of the United States, which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. POMERENE submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 12766) to increase the efficiency of the Military Establishment of the United States, which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 12766) to increase the efficiency of the Military Establishment of the United States, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. HARDWICK submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 12766) to increase the efficiency of the Military Establishment of the United States, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

MILITARY POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. TILLMAN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 156) which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed 1,000 additional copies of Senate Document No. 494, Sixty-second Congress, second session, entitled "The Military Policy of the United States," by Bvt. Maj. Gen. Emory Upton, United States Army, for the use of the Senate document room.

ADDRESS BY HON. JOSEPHUS DANIELS (S. DOC. NO. 382).

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an address by Hon. Josephus Daniels, Secretary of the Navy, in presenting commissions to the graduating class of the United States Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md., Friday, June 4, 1915, be printed as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

SINKING OF NEUTRAL VESSELS (S. DOC. NO. 381).

Mr. NELSON. I have certain data concerning the sinking of neutral vessels belonging to the northern neutral nations of Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and Holland, which were sunk by German submarines, mines, or warships between the dates of August 1, 1914, and March 25, 1916. I ask that the matter be printed as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PRICE OF GASOLINE.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I am in receipt of very many communications from New Jersey, as well as from adjoining States, urging that some steps be taken with reference to the ever-increasing cost of gasoline. I therefore desire to submit the resolution which I send to the desk, and I respectfully ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the resolution be read, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 19) was read, as follows:

Whereas in the stride of human progress and invention gasoline has become as much a necessity to the thrift and welfare of the American people as a source of power and propulsion as is coal; and

Whereas the commercial cost of the same has been advanced from time to time until it has reached a most unreasonable figure, thereby imposing an unjust burden on the people; and

Whereas this product is controlled by a trust, to wit, the Standard Oil Co.: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That the Attorney General of the United States be, and is hereby, directed to cause an investigation of the subject as to whether this phenomenal increase in price of this article is the result of any violation of the laws of the United States.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I desire to say that this question has agitated not one class, but almost every class of our fellow citizens. The price of gasoline has risen in strides from 10 and 11 cents until, I believe, it is now about 28 cents a gallon, with the knowledge that it is fast approaching the price of 40 cents.

Gasoline is a prime necessity. It is no longer an article that affects only those who ride in automobiles, for nearly every commercial wagon is being driven by gasoline and on every farm and in almost every workshop gasoline is used as a propelling and motive power. The tremendous advance in the price of this commodity has agitated our people; it is the prevailing opinion amongst them that this article is controlled and owned and its price is advanced from time to time by the Standard Oil Co., and it is their desire that the subject may be investigated.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not rise to object to the consideration of the resolution, but I ask the Senator from New Jersey if it is not true that the Federal Trade Commission is now investigating the subject matter of the resolution?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I was not aware of that fact.

Mr. CUMMINS. I also ask this question: Is it not the duty of the Attorney General to institute proper proceedings against the combination or conspiracy without any request from the Senate of the United States or the Congress of the country?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Without being a lawyer, I should say that it might be the duty of the Attorney General to institute these proceedings; but I realize the fact that the Attorney General of the United States is an exceedingly busy man, much engrossed with affairs, and with a legal mind; and mayhap this proposition might be shunted to the rear in order that he might take up some strictly legal problem within his scope and no attention might be paid to this matter. I urge the adoption of the resolution as a reminder that this is vital to the people. In the case of every farmer who has a thrashing machine, where they formely used horse power, and for a while steam, through coal—those things are things of the past. Every farmer now owns a little gasoline engine, which he uses to saw his wood, to churn his milk, and to do a thousand other things on the farm.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I do.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I should like to ask the Senator what hope he has that the price of gasoline will be reduced if the trust to which he refers is attacked by the Attorney General, judging from what has occurred in the past in such matters?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Well, I confess that there may be generally but little hope; but I want to have the machinery of the courts put into operation, and, if possible—I do not know whether it is possible or not—to suspend the operations of this greedy monster that is fattening on the people of America.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, a few moments ago the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] asked a question. I will state for his information that the Federal Trades Commission is engaged in investigating the very matter covered by the pending resolution. I know that from statements made to me by members of that commission. I am informed that the Department of Justice is also using the forces at its command in investigating the same subject.

I thought I ought to make this statement at this point. What may come of these investigations I do not knew. I do know that if the Department of Justice has power to act, or if it be possible to enact some additional necessary legislation that would enable the judicial forces of the country to act, I wish that might be done. I do not say there is a special monopoly; I do not know about that in connection with this particular matter; but I would like to take this combination, or whatever it may be, by the throat and crush it. Every Senator here knows—he does not think, but he knows—that the users of gasoline are being to-day robbed by a band of thieves.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator speaks of additional legislation. I can not conceive of any additional legislation being needed. We covered the entire subject by the Federal Trades Commission; we covered it by an amendment to the Clayton antitrust law, and we have the Sherman antitrust law. No additional legislation is needed.

Mr. STONE. Maybe not.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. In answer to the suggestions of the Senator from Missouri, I will state that he says he knows these things. The public does not know anything about them. The public does not know that any steps are being taken. This is the first time I have heard that the departments were investigating the subject, or I perhaps should not have pressed the resolution. At all events, what earthly harm can be done by passing this resolution, as an expression of sentiment on the part of this great body that we protest against this thing, and that we ask the machinery of our courts to investigate this greedy monopoly, and, if possible, to take them by the throat and, if they have any lawful life, to squeeze it out and let the public have their innings for a little time?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan and other Senators. Oh, no!

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I ask that we may have immediate consideration of the resolution.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I hope I may be indulged just a moment while I suggest to the Senate, and especially to the Senator from New Jersey, that I know that there is now pending before the Federal Trade Commission a proceeding intended to develop the whole subject. It is upon a complaint that the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana is in conspiracy with the several Standard Oil Cos. of the eastern country, the effect of which is to lift the prices of gasoline in the eastern country not directly served by the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana far above the prices in the western country, in which there is some competition brought about by independent refiners and dealers in oil. I am sure that the result of the investigation will be promptly referred to the Department of Justice, and I sincerely hope that the conspiracy which I believe exists will be exposed and overthrown.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to add to what has been said that I am advised that the Trade Commission will report probably within the next two or three days; that they have about completed their work, and that certainly within the next five days the result of their work will be made public.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. In the nature of things this can do no harm. It will only be another little jog. I have never been in a lawsuit in my life, thank God, but I do know the eternally slow processes of the law. I want just to punch the thing up by this gentle admonition that the Senate of the United States are onto the methods and ways of this monopoly, and we mean that the public shall be apprised of it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I hope the honorable Senator from New Jersey will stand his ground and not yield. We should have a test of this question now. The people have been imposed upon long enough, and the Department of Justice should wake up to the outrage that is being perpetrated by this combination.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The Senator need not worry. I shall stand my ground, as I always do. I am not cowed by the Standard Oil Co.'s influence.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I suggest that there are statements of facts in the preamble of the resolution that place the Senate on record as to certain statements. I do not believe all Senators would want to be considered as indorsing all of the statements of facts contained in the "whereases."

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I think the Senator from Pennsylvania is a very liberal user of gasoline in his sumptuous automobiles, and I should think——

Mr. OLIVER. Oh, Mr. President, I wish the Senator would stick to the subject. I am talking about what is said in the preamble.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I stand by the preamble.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the preamble of the resolution may be read again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the preamble.

The Secretary read as follows:

Whereas, in the stride of human progress and invention, gasoline has become as much a necessity to the thrift and welfare of the American people as a source of power and propulsion as is coal; and

Whereas the commercial cost of the same has been advanced from time to time until it has reached a most unreasonable figure, thereby imposing an unjust burden on the people; and

Whereas this product is controlled by a trust, to wit, the Standard Oil Co.: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, as a question of fact, I thought the Standard Oil Co. had been broken up and dispersed into its original parts for the purpose of promoting competition. I thought we had had a great legal process which had had that result. This is saying that the action of the courts and the action of the Government have not broken up the Standard Oil Co.; that it is still in existence as a trust.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I should like to say, with reference to that, that the Senator from Massachusetts realizes that the Standard Oil Co. was organized under th régime of the Republican Party, and, like very many of the schemes that were organized under the beneficent influence of that party——

Mr. LODGE. I remember that it was organized in New Jersey. [Laughter.]

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. It was organized under the Republican Party, and hence has a foundation very deep and very difficult to shake. All we want is a little extension of time and we will shake it from its moorings.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator from New Jersey yield to me?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Would it not be just as well to strike out the preamble and adopt the resolution?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Why, yes; since the public know it, I am willing to strike out the preamble and have the resolution adopted.

Mr. HARDWICK. Let us do that, then.

Mr. LODGE. Let us have the resolution read.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I can not understand, though, the exceeding timidity of the Standard Oil Co. Why, in the name of heaven, should we——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I believe I have the floor, and I ask for the reading of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That the Attorney General of the United States be, and is hereby, directed to cause an investigation of the subject as to whether this phenomenal increase in price of this article is the result of any violation of the laws of the United States.

Mr. LODGE. I think the resolution is wholly proper, and I hope it will pass. It seems to me, however, that the preamble is rather——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I think they are very justifiable parts of the whole, and I can not see any reason for timidity in arraigning the Standard Oil Co. It has been obnoxious and an abomination to the minds of all fair-minded men ever since it existed, and around my particular part of the country it practically overshadows me. Its officials live in multimillionaires' houses on all sides, and bask in public favor. God knows I am not frightened by them, and I do not know why the Senator from Georgia should be.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, has the Senator finished?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I have finished, if the Senator wants to ask me a question; yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; I will take the floor in my own right.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. All right; proceed.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am not at all frightened about the Standard Oil Co. or anything else, that I know of; but the Senator's resolution, with which I am thoroughly in sympathy, commits the Senate to a lot of statements of facts as to which I do not know whether they are true or not; that is all. It is bad policy for a legislative body to be adopting preambles containing a number of statements that may or may not be true. With the resolution itself I am in hearty sympathy; but as to the rhetoric embodied in the preamble, while I am in sympathy with it if it is accurate, I do not like to——

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator means alleged facts, does he not, not facts?

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not necessarily facts.

Mr. HARDWICK. Of course, I mean that I do not know whether they are true or not, and that is always the objection to preambles; so that I wish the Senator's resolution were differently phrased. I wish it directed that the Attorney General at once proceed to enforce the laws which we have on the statute books, which are ample for any purposes that have been disclosed by the statement of any Senator here, instead of directing a mere investigation.

I am not at all tender-footed about the proposition. The facts have been abundantly investigated already. What the Senate ought to do is to pass a resolution requesting the Attorney General to proceed to enforce the existing laws. I do not see why we should be expected to indorse a preamble that may or may not contain accurate statements of facts or alleged facts.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Well, Mr. President, I should like to ask whether it is within the range of propriety that I might divide the resolution and ask the sentiment of the Senate on the preamble?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator from Georgia does not mean to indicate, by his observations, that the present Attorney General or the Department of Justice is failing in any particular respect to enforce the law?

Mr. HARDWICK. No; I simply supposed that they were not proceeding with this particular matter or the Senator from New Jersey would not have presented the resolution.

Mr. STONE. They are.

Mr. HARDWICK. They are proceeding with respect to this very matter? Then it seems to me we do not need the resolution at all. I have no particular objection to the resolution, but if I were drawing the resolution it would have been a good deal stronger than this rhetorical resolution of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The Senator from Georgia did not draw the resolution. I did. I imagine it might be couched in different terms, but I stand by the resolution and the preamble. I should like to have a vote on it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am in full accord and sympathy with the object of the resolution. While I know that the Department of Justice is at this very time investigating this matter, and that another department of the Government is also doing so, I have no objection to the passage of the resolution.

The Senator desires a vote upon the question as to whether the preamble shall be included in the passage of the resolution. In order that he may get that vote and get the sense of the Senate upon it, I move to amend the resolution by striking out the preamble.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The vote comes first on the resolution, does it not?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The resolution is a whole and the preamble is a part of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In order to settle this matter, if it can be settled this morning, the Chair will state that he is of the opinion that the vote is on the resolution, and then the question will be, Shall the preamble stand?

Mr. SMOOT. That is according to the rules.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senate perhaps has forgotten that some time ago a resolution was introduced by myself calling upon the Secretary of the Interior for all possible information concerning the production and output of gasoline, calling attention to the high prices that were being charged, and asking for a most thorough investigation and report.

The Secretary of the Interior gave us a very good report covering every portion of the question, and I think it established two things: First, that there was more gasoline in sight now and available for use than ever before in any one year; secondly, that the companies—about three in number—furnishing almost all of the gasoline, were receiving enormous profits; that the dividends of some of these companies were running even over 100 per cent. There was at least enough in the report to indicate that there was a general understanding as to the matter of prices and that the prices charged were far greater than were necessary to secure a reasonable return upon the investment.

I was informed that the Department of Justice were investigating that subject, and I think with the report and with the passage of this resolution, which may accelerate their activities, we may get some good results, and I shall take pleasure in supporting the resolution. It does not seem to me to make much difference whether we denominate the Standard Oil Co. as a trust or not. The fact remains that it is the principal producer of the finished product in the United States and has very much to do with the matter of fixing the prices.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I will state to the Senator that I was not aware of the fact of the introduction of the resolution of investigation, but it seems to me that that is another verification of the wisdom of my preamble. It is an admitted fact, and I am justified richly. When the Senator from Missouri referred again to the fact that the department, he knew, were investigating this matter, it brought to my mind a little line or two in the Bible, where it says, "Let us not be weary in well-doing." So if these gentlemen have admonished the Attorney General and the Department of Justice of the wisdom and necessity of this action and have stirred them up, then I think there is an additional reason for jogging them on a peg, at least.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I just call the Senator's attention to the fact that the letter of February 3, 1916, printed now as a public document, is replete with all the facts necessary to understand the gasoline situation.

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask the Senator the number?

Mr. McCUMBER. It is Document No. 310.

Mr. THOMAS. Thank you.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The price goes up notwithstanding that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I have not the slightest doubt in my mind that the increase in the price of gasoline we have witnessed during the last few months is altogether without excuse, and it is quite likely that when the matter is thoroughly investigated it will be found that some people are violating the law and ought to be prosecuted.

I have no objection to this resolution being passed, but I take occasion to say, however, that it has no more force or effect than a resolution of a similar kind passed by any respectable unofficial gathering of gentlemen. It is not the business of the Senate; it is not legislative business. When we pass such a resolution we are undertaking gratuitously to give advice to the executive department of the Government, which, under the Constitution, is charged with the full responsibility of executing the law, a function with which we have nothing to do.

I think we ought to be rather chary of passing resolutions of this character, because, however important the subject may be, after all, whenever we do it, we are invading the province of a coordinate branch of the Government. The Constitution says that the President shall take care that the laws shall be executed, and this is nothing more than advice to the Executive, and must proceed upon the theory that we are fearful that the Executive will not discharge his duty unless we resolve ourselves into a sort of town meeting for the purpose of telling him what it is.

Mr. HARDWICK. I should like to ask the Senator a question before he takes his seat. Does the Senator see any impropriety in either branch of Congress, or both Houses of Congress, advising the Attorney General in this case?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have already said that I do not object to the resolution, although, I repeat, we are not passing it in pursuance of any legislative or other power which we possess.

Mr. HARDWICK. No.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the preamble be agreed to?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I merely wish to take two or three minutes. Some levity was manifested in the Chamber when our distinguished friend from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] inserted in the preamble the statement that the Standard Oil Co. has a monopoly. I do not think anybody denies that. The Standard Oil Co. does not deny it, because when we had before the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs the resolution introduced by the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] to investigate the Osage oil leases it was declared then, with regard to one producer, a certain man named Mr. Barnsdall, that the Standard Oil Co. controlled the directors in his company, and he testified before the committee that they were so grasping that they required him to permit that his oil and the by-product thereof should be marketed through the Standard Oil Co. The testimony was to the effect before the committee, and no one denied it, that the Standard Oil Co. absolutely controls the oil.

Mr. HARDWICK. I just wish to ask the Senator, is it true or only a fiction that the Standard Oil Co. has been dissolved?

Mr. ASHURST. I presume that legally it has been dissolved, but in fact it has not been dissolved, and every Senator knows it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the preamble.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask for a division of the preamble. There are two propositions in it. The first I think we can all vote for. The second declares that the Standard Oil Co. is still entirely in control. We can not vote for some of it, because we have been advised by the judgment of the court that it has been dissolved, and it was separated into five different parts or more. I should like the first part, protesting against the high price, to be first voted upon.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I am quite willing to have it divided and to vote, first, on the first part of the preamble.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The first part directs the Attorney General, and I have not any doubt the Attorney General is doing his duty. I have not any doubt he is at work upon it; I have not any doubt that the Interstate Trade Commission has been at work upon it; and that they are working just as fast as they can to accumulate a proper basis for a proceeding.

Mr. GALLINGER. I observe that Rule XVIII, I believe it is, has been lost sight of in this debate, and a great deal of valuable time has been taken when we ought to be giving consideration to the Army bill. I move to lay the preamble on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire, to lay the preamble on the table.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I ask for a roll call.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KERN (when Mr. FLETCHER's name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. He is paired with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]. The senior Senator from Florida is absent on official business. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] and I withhold my vote.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK], who is not present. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], who is absent. For that reason I withhold my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN], with whom the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is paired, and that will allow the Senator from Michigan and myself to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I am at liberty to vote, and vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. Not knowing how he would vote if here, I will withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LIPPITT (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I observe that he has not voted, and I withdraw my vote.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I observe that my general pair, the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], is absent, and I withhold my vote. I make this announcement for all other votes during the day.

Mr. LODGE. My colleague [Mr. WEEKS] is absent from the Chamber. He has a general pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES].

Mr. JAMES (after having voted in the negative). I transfer the general pair I have with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and allow my vote in the negative to stand.

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], on account of illness. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. CHILTON. I have a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. He is absent and I withhold my vote.

I wish also to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. GOFF] on account of illness.

Mr. HOLLIS. I wish to state that the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] is necessarily absent.

Mr. GRONNA (after having voted in the negative). I have voted, but I have a general pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON], and, as I can not get a transfer, I will be compelled to withdraw my vote.

Mr. CATRON. I have a general pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], but the pair is of such a nature that I am at perfect liberty to vote on this question, and I will let my vote stand.

Mr. GALLINGER (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] who is absent. Not knowing how that Senator would vote on this motion, I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 35, as follows:

YEAS—23.

So the Senate refused to lay the preamble on the table.

Mr. STONE. I should like to have the last clause of the preamble read.

Mr. JAMES. Let it all be read. Some of the Senators now present were not here when it was read.

Mr. STONE. My request is that the last clause be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Of the preamble?

Mr. STONE. Of the preamble.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

And whereas this product is controlled by a trust, to wit, the Standard Oil Co.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, it is needless to say that I have no special concern, and I think it would be needless to say that no Senator has any special concern, about the Standard Oil Co. or any other manufacturer of gasoline. My objection to that clause of the preamble just read is that it selects one manufacturer and indicts him before the Senate and the country as if it were the only criminal. I have no objection to indicting one, but I do not wish by that act of indictment to appear to excuse others who are equally guilty.

I confess I am not very familiar with this subject, but my general information is that there are several distinct and separate companies engaged in manufacturing gasoline, and while I do not know it to be true and therefore I do not charge it to be true, I believe that there is an unlawful combination between these several manufacturers of gasoline to establish arbitrary and artificial prices and force a most outrageous advance in the cost of gasoline to the consumers of the country. These people are criminals and ought to be convicted and sent to prison.

It would seem to me, if I might make the suggestion to my friend from New Jersey, that this clause of the preamble would be better phrased if he had said "there being an unlawful combination between the makers of gasoline to extort from the consumers of the country," without charging that only one of these manufacturers was guilty. I am convinced there is more than one.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, it seems that all of these companies are part of an harmonious whole. Referring to this report, which was the result of the inquiry of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], I find that, among other things, it speaks of the Imperial Oil Co. (Ltd.), of Canada. It also states that the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey controls 80 per cent of this product, and if you will read further you will find it is stated that the Standard Oil Co. is the predominating owner and controller, the life and animus of all these corporations. With all this information, are we to go before them with bended knee and tearful eye, and say we can not tell the truth about them simply because they are the Standard Oil Co.? I urge you, in God's name, not to do that. I have no timidity in the matter. This great monster was organized and incorporated under the laws of New Jersey, and it has robbed the people for a quarter of a century.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Would not the Senator from New Jersey accept a substitute for the last line in his resolution? Instead of designating merely one company, would he not say?—

And whereas it is apparent from the uniformity in the increase of price that an unlawful combination exists between producers thereof.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I submit my case to the good sense and fairness of the American people and of the United States Senate. I can not believe anything else other than what I have stated. I do not want to say that I believe the moon is made of green cheese when I know that is not true.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] knows, and everybody else knows, that the Standard Oil Co. is the all-pervading and all-powerful monopoly that controls the entire oil product of this country and all of its by-products as well.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I believe it dominates them in some way or other.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. In God's name, then, why shall we not say we believe that?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not know that; but I have no doubt there is a combination which is illegal.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I call attention to Rule XVIII of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was just about to do that.

Mr. GALLINGER. One Senator has now spoken about a dozen times, when the rule provides that he shall speak not more than twice on a subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The rule provides that a Senator shall speak only twice on one subject. Certainly the Senate now knows all about this question.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not think the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] any more nearly states the facts than does the original resolution. The Senator from Georgia speaks of the uniform increase of price in gasoline. I have in my office a letter from a consumer of that article in Cincinnati, which indicates that there is a difference in the price of gasoline in the several larger cities of the country, aggregating 10 cents per gallon—a greater difference in the price of gasoline in those several cities than was the total price of gasoline two or three years ago. I have not any doubt in my mind but that there has been some artificial increase in price, and some variance in the prices of gasoline due to some effort on the part of the manufacturers of that article.

There seems to be some question in the minds of Senators as to whether or not the Standard Oil Co. is a trust. The decision of the Supreme Court a few years ago, notably the opinion handed down by the Chief Justice, recited that by the undisputed facts disclosed in the record the Standard Oil Co. was a trust, in violation of both the first and second sections of the Sherman antitrust law; but, notwithstanding the fact that the company existed and operated in violation of those sections, no criminal prosecution was ever begun against the Standard Oil Co., and the matter was allowed to drift along until the criminal acts referred to by the Supreme Court were barred by the statute of limitations.

At the time the decree was entered it was believed that it would not succeed in dissolving this trust. It was a very peculiar decree, one which allowed common holdings in all the several companies into which this company was supposed to be dissolved; and I do not think there was a soul in the United States, outside of the Attorney General himself, who believed that it would result in the dissolution of the trust or grant any relief to the people. Within a short time after this so-called decree of dissolution was entered the prices of the stocks of the Standard Oil Co. increased beyond any point that they had ever reached at any period in its history. In view of the effect which present conditions have had upon the price of gasoline, I have no doubt whatever in my mind that there is a combination, a trust, if you please, in violation of the Sherman antitrust law, and I am not at all squeamish about voting for this preamble.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, will my friend from Ohio permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I agree with everything the Senator from Ohio has said, so far as the Standard Oil Co. is concerned. I agree that it has been a grasping and lawless concern, and I do not care with what strong iron grip it may be taken by the throat; but I want to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio and of the Senate to this fact, and I do not want them to overlook it: When we had the tariff bill up two years ago before the Committee on Finance, of which I am a member, and we were talking about taxing gasoline to raise revenue, what occurred? The Standard Oil Co. shrank back in the shadow; it made no appearance, but the so-called independent producers of oil and gasoline came crowding under the banner of "independence" before the committee, to say to us that the Standard Oil Co. was the concern that wanted a tax, and that it alone would profit by the tax and all "independents" would be ruined. My friends on that committee—I happen now to have my eye on the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]—will recall that these so-called "independents" prevented a revenue tax on gasoline on the plea that it would help the Standard Oil and ruin the "independents." I am not going into that argument now; but these very gentlemen to-day are not offering to the American people, the consumers of the country, any concession; they are not selling cheaper; they are not helping the consumers; they are cheek by jowl with the Standard Oil. If the Standard Oil Co. is leading in this trust or combination, or whatever you call it, the so-called independents, who came with tears in their eyes before the committee and before Congress two years ago, are participants in this crime. I want to see all of them denounced alike and punished alike. I shall remember these independent mendicants when next they appear before the Finance Committee.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Missouri in the belief that many of these independent companies are only independent in name.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I think it would be well that the world might understand all of the facts——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will certainly be compelled to enforce the rule. The Senator from New Jersey has made five or six speeches, and the rule gives him the privilege of making but two on a given subject.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I trust, in the interest of the people, I may be allowed to make another one, making the number seven. I shall make no extended speech.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There has been objection, and the Chair must enforce the rule allowing a Senator but two speeches on one subject.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Well, I ask leave of the Senate that I may have printed in the RECORD certain figures as to the prices of the product of gasoline to-day, showing that it is not a dearth of supply which occasions the increased prices.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, they have already been printed.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, as the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] has exhausted his time, and I have not, I think there should be read by the Secretary, and I ask permission of the Senate that the Secretary may read, practically one page of Senate Document No. 310, consisting of the portions which I have marked, which will clearly indicate the cause of the high prices of gasoline in the enormous amounts that have been paid out in cash dividends and in stock dividends. I call attention to the latter part of page 21 and nearly all of page 22, and I ask that the marked portion may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary proceeded to read, and read as follows:

(f) Financial influences: The recent rapid increases in the prices of crude oil and gasoline—

Mr. McCUMBER. May I say here that that is in response to the question, "What cause, if any, can be given for the sudden extraordinary rise in the retail price of gasoline?"

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Who is answering the question that is propounded?

Mr. McCUMBER. The Secretary of the Interior.

The Secretary resumed the reading, and was interrupted by—

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the reading long enough to ask the Senator from North Dakota from what the Secretary is reading?

Mr. McCUMBER. He is reading from the report of the Secretary of the Interior in response to a resolution which was passed by the Senate. The document is Senate Document 310, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading, as follows:

(f) Financial influences: The recent rapid increases in the prices of crude oil and gasoline have been accompanied by rapid increases in the market quotations of oil company shares. The market values of the capital stocks of 38 corporations, of which 35 are in the Standard Oil group and 3 are typical large independent companies, have increased remarkably in the last six months. (See Pl. II, curves D and E.) The stocks of other oil companies probably show a similar rise, but the quotations are not at hand. The 38 companies selected are believed to represent all phases of the oil industry. These rapid increases might be ascribed to the general condition of prosperity and the general upward trend of the stock market but for the fact that during the last quarter of 1915 the oil company stocks did not rise and fall with the market. The weekly curve of The Annalist showing the course of the stock market as indicated by the average price of 50 stocks—25 railroad and 25 industrial—shows that the market was rising rapidly during October, while the oil companies either remained stationary or fell off slightly. More striking, however, is the fact that during November, when the stock market was falling, the oil stocks were rising rapidly, and that during December the rise of oil stocks was many times more rapid than that of the general market. (See Pl. II, curves C, D, and E.) It should be noted also that the stocks of the three typical large independent companies have risen much more rapidly than those of the Standard group. (See Pl. II, curves D and E.) Other indications that the rise of oil stocks may be ascribed in part at least to increased profits are found in the following quotations, the first and second being from the Commercial and Financial Chronicle, of New York, for January 22, 1916:

"Standard Oil of California—50 per cent stock dividend: A stock dividend of 50 per cent has been declared on the $49,686,655 stock, payable April 15 to holders of record March 4, along with the regular quarterly 2½ per cent cash distribution payable March 15 to holders of record February 9." (Vol. 100, p. 896.)

"Imperial Oil Co. (Ltd.), Canada—Stock dividend: This company, which on November 15, 1915, filed with the secretary of state of Canada a certificate of increase of authorized capital stock from $15,000,000 ($11,000,000 outstanding) to $50,000,000 (par $100), has this week distributed a stock dividend of 100 per cent, thus increasing the outstanding stock to $22,000,000. The Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey is said to own an 80 per cent interest."

The Financial Times of Montreal on November 27 said:

"The Imperial Oil Co. is one of the most progressive and promising of the subsidiaries of the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey. In 1907 the company's outstanding capital stock amounted to only $1,000,000. Practically all additional sums up to $11,000,000 are said to have been for extensions, etc."

The third quotation is from Petroleum Age of New York for December, 1915:

"OIL AND GAS SECURITIES.

"Convincing proof of the amazing recovery within the oil industry in the last half of 1915 is furnished by the dividend declarations of the Standard Oil group for the last quarter, which reached the astonishing total of $21,788,636, which is the record for any quarter since the dissolution, with the exception of the first quarter of 1913, when Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey made its famous 40 per cent cash distribution. True it is that of this sum, $4,890,000, representing the 15 per cent dividend of Illinois Pipe Line, 5 per cent by Prairie Pipe Line, and 3 per cent by Prairie Oil & Gas Co., will not be payable until January 15, but all of them are payable to December shareholders and represent distributions from 1915 profits.

"Including these sums, the total of regular and extra cash dividends since the dissolution in December, 1911, reaches the impressive total of $290,666,083, to which must be added stock dividends at par totaling $169,100,000. Taking into account the present market value of the distributed stock, the cash value of all distributions in the last four years by this group is in excess of half a billion dollars.

"The market effect of this enormous earning capacity is strikingly reflected in the steady appreciation in value of the old Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey stock 'all on,' which has risen from less than 650 at the time of the dissolution in December, 1911, to a new high record of 1770 during the current month. As the variation of price in this comprehensive security reflects the general trend of the oil securities markets, the accompanying 'graph' will illustrate the course of the industry in the past four years."

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I understand there appears to be some fear that the Senate, by adopting the preamble of the resolution, may go on record as to something which has not been established as a fact. I understand there are two statements of facts contained in the preamble, one that the price of gasoline and oil has risen. I apprehend there is no doubt about that fact. Another statement is that the Standard Oil Co. has a monopoly of the oil business of the United States. I do not think anybody seriously doubts that fact. I think that is something that is accepted as a matter of fact, as a matter of common knowledge. But if anybody would like to convince himself of it, I would suggest that he read the hearings before the Committee on Indian Affairs of the United States, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, and he will there learn that it is taken as true. No one disputes the fact that the Standard Oil Co. is in control of the oil business, and, moreover, a great many so-called independent operators are in fact under the thumb and control of the Standard Oil Co.

In fact, the evidence produced at the hearings goes to show that even independent or so-called independent operators holding leases under the United States as trustee for the Indians are virtually controlled by the Standard Oil Co.; and as one illustration I should like to point to the case of T. N. Barnsdall, an operator of oil lands in Oklahoma. He was the holder of a lease which expired on March 16 of this year—this month, in fact—and had under his control something like 240,000 acres of Indian oil lands. He held under the Foster lease, so called. Mr. Barnsdall is classed as one of the independent oil operators; and in the course of the hearing, where he appeared for the purpose of having his leases renewed, and in support of a resolution offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], he made certain statements as to the facts. On page 66 Mr. Barnsdall was asked this question:

Senator CURTIS. I should like to ask you, Mr. Barnsdall, if you are limited to the amount of land that they have allotted you under these rules and regulations, how long would it take you to recover the amount of money that you are now out for development there?

Mr. BARNSDALL. Well, it would take me a good long time, but if half of my wells are sold away from me and I have got nothing to keep my production up, at least no lease, why, the Standard Oil Co. would close out my loan, and that would be a serious thing to me, because it will take a lot of my stocks that I have been 25 years accumulating, and they are valuable, but when you come to sell anything there are not any buyers; you do not get anything for it as a rule, not very much, and that is the hardest part of this thing to me. If I can get some leases renewed, and my wells, the Standard Oil Co. have promised, by letter to me, that they will extend my matters for three years.

Then he was asked this question:

Senator OWEN. Does the Standard Oil Co. pay you as much as the other pipe lines would pay you?

Mr. BARNSDALL. Well, they make the price down there, although the independent refiners are now having to pay a premium.

Mr. Barnsdall testified substantially that he could not operate, that the Standard Oil Co. would not let him operate, or that they would foreclose on him unless he got renewals, and that he could not sell to any other companies until he had paid up his account with the Standard Oil Co.

Senator HUSTING. You said you did not think you could sell to any other oil companies until you had paid up the Standard Oil. Why is that?

Mr. BARNSDALL. I could sell any other oil company. I do sell the National Refining Co., of Cleveland, some oil in Oklahoma. I can sell oil that they have not loaned this money on to anybody that I want to, but I could not very well with the mortgage and they running the property. I could not very well sell it to anybody else. I would have to sell it to them.

Senator HUSTING. Will you explain that to us. You say they are running the property.

Mr. BARNSDALL. Not the Standard Oil Co., but it is people that they got. When I made the loan they had Mr. Young—he never does anything without letting me know, but at the same time I do not see how I could sell any oil to an independent, or to anybody outside of them from that property until I have paid for it.

Now, this question was asked by Senator WALSH:

They—

Meaning the Standard Oil—

have named three of your five directors, have they not?

Mr. BARNSDALL. Yes, sir.

So that the Standard Oil Co. had three out of the five directors running Mr. Barnsdall's plant, who were telling him to whom to sell, how much to charge, and in fact they were running his business—running the business of Mr. Barnsdall under a lease which he was holding from the United States as trustee for the Indians, so that in a way even the oil lands under the control of the United States, namely, the Indian lands, which it is holding in trust, is finding its way into the hands of the Standard Oil Co.

There were about 260 holders of leases under the Foster lease, and many of them appeared before the committee and stated that they were independent oil producers. They were asked questions like this over and over again, until such time as the committee grew tired of the same questions and the same answers: "What do you do with your oil?" "Why, we have to sell it to the Standard Oil Co. or some other pipe-line company." "Who makes the price?" "The Standard Oil Co. makes the price." "How do they make it?" "They post it up every morning." That is for the raw oil. Then the question was asked them later: "Who fixes the price of the oil to the consumer?" "The Standard Oil Co. fixes the price to the consumer, and everybody has to sell at the price fixed by the Standard Oil Co." The question was asked then: "What would happen if you bought oil or sold oil for a different price than that fixed by the Standard Oil Co., or sold oil to the consumer for less than the price fixed by the Standard Oil Co.?" The answer was that they would close them out or run them out of the territory, or words to that effect.

So that when we talk about independent operators, men having wells that produce 10 or 20 barrels a day, or even some who in the aggregate produce a great deal more than that, they are only independent in the sense that they are allowed to take the oil out of the ground under their own auspices; but when they want to sell it they have got to sell it at a price fixed by the Standard Oil Co., and the people have got to buy the refined product at the price fixed by the Standard Oil Co. I know that when some of us, one or two of the unsophisticated new members of the committee, asked these questions we were looked upon with pitying scorn by the operators as asking a very foolish question, namely, as to whether or not the Standard Oil Co. was controlling the oil business. It was all one story, all to one effect, and that was that the Standard Oil Co. was in the saddle in the oil business of the country. If I remember correctly, I think that fact was admitted by the Secretary of the Interior at that same hearing; and no one seems to know just what the remedy is.

In reply to what the Senator from Missouri said about the independent operators appearing and protesting against the tax, I can easily understand that. The Standard Oil Co. can lower the price of the raw product that it must buy and can raise the price of the refined product which it sells to the public at any time it wants to, and we are in this position: If we raise the tax on them, all they have to do the next morning is to post their prices accordingly, so that it simply wipes out the tax and loads it on to the back of the producer or the consumer. They have nothing to fear; but the independent oil producer, who has to sell to the Standard Oil Co. and whose selling price is fixed by the Standard Oil Co., has no remedy but to pay the tax. In other words, a tax levied upon the oil as against the Standard Oil Co. merely results not in increased taxes upon the Standard Oil Co., but in increased prices to the consumer.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HUSTING. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. From the Senator's investigation of this matter does he believe there are any independents?

Mr. HUSTING. Well, there are independents in the sense that I believe that there are some that are operating on their own capital, men who get some little oil out of the ground. To that extent they are independent oil operators and oil-producing companies. I take it for granted that there are some that are independent.

Mr. BORAH. But there are no independents who can reach the public or affect the price?

Mr. HUSTING. Personally, I do not believe there are. I do not believe they can. The evidence taken before the committee shows that there are none.

It was stated before the committee that there was no company in the United States that could compete with the Standard Oil Co. Why? Because the latter either produces the oil or buys it at its own price; transports it in the pipe lines, whose rates, I think, it controls; runs it into refineries that it owns or that it controls; and last, but not least, has selling agencies in every city and in every little town in the United States, and no one is in a position to market their oil as it is.

Why, we need not look for causes. A company that is powerful enough to fix the price at which it will buy the raw product, and powerful enough to fix the price at which it will sell to the consumer the refined product, controls the situation. It does not make any difference as to the whys and the wherefores; the fact of itself establishes the truth of the claim that the Standard Oil monopolizes and controls the whole oil business. When these men came before this committee and said that the Standard Oil Co. posted notices telling how much they would pay for the raw oil or petroleum, and also posted notices as to the price they would charge the consumer, I do not not know of any power that is any greater than that. It is certainly greater than the power of the United States itself, which can not control the price of either.

So I say, as far as a tax against oil is concerned, in answer to the Senator from Missouri, I can easily understand that a tax levied against the Standard Oil Co. merely puts the tax on the backs of the consumer. In other words, it results in the advance of oil; but a tax that has to be paid by the so-called independent operator comes out of his pocket, of course, because he has not any influence or any control over the price of the product.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield for a question, just for information?

Mr. HUSTING. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to ask the Senator if he knows whether the Texas Oil Co. is an independent oil producer?

Mr. HUSTING. I think they are—so-called independent. I do not know.

Mr. SMOOT. I want information, if the Senator has it. Does the Senator know whether they are a large enough oil producer to have an effect upon the price of gasoline in this country?

Mr. HUSTING. I do not think they pretend to. I believe they will admit that they follow the price fixed by the Standard Oil Co.

Mr. SMOOT. I know they do not pretend to, because I can ask the Standard Oil Co. the price of gasoline, and if they quote 24½ cents and I telephone to the Texas Oil Co. they will quote exactly the same price.

Mr. HUSTING. Exactly.

Mr. SMOOT. To-morrow morning I could telephone to the Standard Oil Co., and if the price had dropped or if the price had risen in 10 minutes I could telephone to the Texas company and the price would be identically the same. I was wondering whether the Texas Oil Co., an independent concern, in reality produces enough oil or gasoline in this country to have an effect upon the price, or whether it follows the Standard Oil Co. up or down in price, and whether it produces enough to affect the price or not.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I speak from only the information before the committee. They told us—and there was not a dissenting voice—that the price of oil was fixed by the Standard Oil Co. and that it was followed by everyone—everyone that sold oil.

I simply want to say this, in view of the hesitation of some Senators to vote on this preamble. I believe that since this is a matter of common knowledge, and information of this sort comes before a committee and no one contradicts it and it goes unchallenged, they need have no fear or any doubt that the preamble of the resolution declaring that the price of oil has been raised and that the Standard Oil Co. controls and monopolizes our oil supply is not in strict accordance with acknowledged and conceded facts.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, if the Senate does not want to do an idle thing, it should adopt some preamble to the resolution already favorably voted on, directing the Attorney General to investigate the advance in price of gasoline, because the resolution does not mention gasoline, and gives no indication as to the subject of the resolution. If the Senate rejects the preamble to Senator MARTINE'S resolution, some other preamble should be adopted.

I agree with others who have said that we need have no delicacy here in mentioning the Standard Oil Co. It seems to me the evidence is complete that a Standard Oil combination exists which controls the price of oil. It controls the price that is paid for the oil to the producers as it is taken out of the ground, and controls the price as it is sold in its refined condition to the consumer. It "holds an umbrella" over the few independents that exist under it; they follow the big company and quote the same price; so, in effect, the Standard Oil monopoly does fix the price for the whole country.

Mr. President, the document from the Secretary of the Interior, which was procured through the resolution of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], is very illuminating in some of its statistics. It shows that the high price of gasoline is not due to a falling off in production, because the production of gasoline has enormously increased. It has increased from 6,000,000 barrels in 1899 to 6,900,000 barrels in 1904, to 12,000,000 barrels in 1909, to 34,900,000 barrels in 1914, and last year, in 1915, the number of barrels produced was 41,600,000.

Nor is the high price of gasoline due to a great increase in the export, although there has been some increase. The figures in the Secretary's letter show that, notwithstanding the increased exportation of gasoline, the surplus remaining in this country, which was 11,000,000 barrels in 1909 and 29,000,000 barrels in 1914, was over 35,000,000 barrels in 1915. So the increase in gasoline price is neither due to an increased export nor to a diminished production or supply in this country.

What are the figures which show conclusively what is the cause of this enormous increase in the price of gasoline? They are the figures of dividends in cash and in stock paid to stockholders in the Standard Oil group. For the last three months of last year those dividends amounted to $21,000,000 in cash. Since the so-called Standard Oil "dissolution" five years ago these dividends have aggregated $290,000,000 in cash and, in addition thereto, $169,000,000 in paid-up stock at par—a total in cash and stock dividends during the last five years, since the so-called dissolution, of $459,000,000 distributed to the stockholders of the Standard Oil Co.

These figures show what is the cause of the high price and great advance in gasoline. I think we should not be backward in stating in this resolution what every trade paper states and what is in the mouth of every person—that the high price of gasoline is due to the fact that a combination of the so-called Standard Oil group, mentioned in the official report submitted to the Senate, is controlling the price by a monopoly and deriving enormous dividends as a result.

Mr. President, I hope the Senate will adopt some preamble to the resolution directing the Attorney General to investigate. If there is objection to the preamble offered by the Senator from New Jersey, I suggest this as a substitute:

Whereas it is charged and by many believed that the high price of gasoline is due to the monopoly control of the Standard Oil combination and other interests: Therefore,

Resolved—

And so forth. Will the Senator accept that?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Oh, I suppose so. I accept the preamble.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question then is on the amended preamble.

Mr. LODGE. Let us hear it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It amends the preamble. It is a substitute for the last clause of the preamble. The Senator from New Jersey accepts it.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I will accept that.

The Secretary read as follows:

And whereas it is charged and by many believed that the high price of gasoline is due to the monopoly control of the Standard Oil combination and other interests.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] was called out of the Chamber for a moment. He said that he wished to be heard on this preamble. Therefore I make the point of no quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harding	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Mich.
Bankhead	Hardwick	Myers	Smoot

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to announce, and let the announcement stand for the day, that my colleague [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The morning hour having expired, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 12766) to increase the efficiency of the Military Establishment of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is recognized.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Inasmuch as the subject we have been discussing has been debated pretty thoroughly and we are right up to the eve of a vote, I ask the consent of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] that we may have a vote on the preamble of the resolution. If I thought it would excite any further discussion, I would not press it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hope the Senate will not consent to that. The Sente has control of the matter, and we have now been an hour and a half on the proposition.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I ask for a vote, Mr. President.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I object, Mr. President. I insist on the regular order.

HOUSE BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

H. R. 4767. An act authorizing the Director of the Census to collect and publish statistics of cotton seed and cottonseed products was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Census.

H. J. Res. 79. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of Labor to permit the South Carolina Naval Militia to use the Charleston immigration station and dock connected therewith was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Immigration.

NATIONAL DEFENSE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12766) to increase the efficiency of the Military Establishment of the United States.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] desires to address the Senate, and before he proceeds I desire to suggest the order in which this matter shall be taken up, and that is that the amendment be taken up as a whole and voted upon or amended to perfect it, if the Senate desires to offer any amendment to it. I think it will expedite matters to pursue that course.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senate acted on that yesterday.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senate determined yesterday to take up the substitute and perfect it first, so that the substitute is before the Senate to be perfected by amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That course will be satisfactory to me, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that upon yesterday the Senate, by motion, set aside the rule of the Senate and ordered that the amendment be first perfected before the original bill was perfected. That is in violation of the rule of the Senate, but everyone seems to be satisfied with it, and the Chair has no objection.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the Senator from Alabama will permit me just a moment further, I desire to say that the committee will have a few amendments which it will desire to offer at the proper time. I think probably it would be best to have the speeches made before those amendments are offered, and after the committee amendments have been disposed of then the bill will be open for general amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, the question of the preparedness of a country to defend itself in case of war is the first governmental duty of a legislative body. I do not to-day intend to go into a discussion of all the items in the bill now pending before the Senate, but there is one question involved in determining whether our Government is prepared to meet in war a first-class foreign power that is more important, in my judgment, than any other. That is the question as to whether we can supply the raw material that is necessary to produce the powder to carry on a war.

In the Senate this morning a bill was presented seeking to enable a private corporation to develop water powers in this country for the purpose of making nitrogen to manufacture powder. There was also a bill presented that comes from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, looking to the development of water power for the purpose of making fertilizers.

Mr. President, I have an amendment pending to the present bill, which I send to the clerks' desk and ask that it may be read, so that the Senate may fully understand the proposition to which I am addressing my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SAULSBURY in the chair). The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed, as a new paragraph, to insert the following:

That to provide for the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen, by improvement of navigation and development of water power, necessary for the manufacture of nitric acid in times of war and fertilizers in times of peace, the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, is hereby authorized and directed, first, to hold hearings and conduct negotiations for the purpose of determining upon a suitable air nitrogen process and the terms under which it can be made available, and, second, to select a suitable site on a navigable stream in the United States for the construction of the necessary dam, locks, substructure, power house, and hydroelectric equipment. The board shall report its findings, with estimates of cost, to the Congress at the earliest practicable time, accompanied by recommendations as to what plans should be adopted for providing the Government an assured and adequate supply of nitric acid in times of war, and, consistent with this purpose, for effectively and economically serving to the greatest extent practicable the agricultural interests of the country in the manufacture of fertilizers in times of peace.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, the fundamental premises upon which is based the proposition for the establishment of the air-nitrogen industry in this country through the action of the Government are clear and undeniable. They are axiomatic, and should carry the force of other self-evident truths.

The first is that a nation can not conduct a war of defense or offense without explosives; that explosives can not be made without nitric acid; that an adequate supply of nitric acid can not be secured except through the use of Chilean saltpeter or the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen; that the supply of Chilean saltpeter might be cut off from the United States at any time by an enemy navy. Therefore it is not only a patriotic duty but a national necessity of the very first order of importance for Congress to insure the establishment in the country of the air-nitrogen industry on a scale adequate to supply the Nation's requirements for nitric acid in times of war.

The second premise is that a people can not survive the fierce competitive struggle in times of peace without a plentiful and cheap food supply; that a cheap food supply is chiefly a question of securing more food per acre cultivated without an increase in labor; that this defines cheap agricultural fertilizers; that cheap agricultural fertilizers are chiefly a question of a plentiful and cheap nitrogen supply; that the one adequate, cheap, and assured source of nitrogen is the atmosphere. Therefore it is an economic necessity of the very first order of importance that the country should have a cheap and plentiful supply of air nitrogen in the form of a fertilizer.

To make assurance of the soundness of these premises doubly sure we have but to consider what has taken place in Europe. Germany at the outbreak of the war was expending for Chilean saltpeter, used chiefly as a fertilizer and for the manufacture of nitric acid, between $40,000,000 and $50,000,000 per year. She had available within the borders of the Empire 660,000 tons, valued at $30,000,000, sufficient for a few months' requirements. When this was exhausted there remained no means of replenishing the supply by reason of her being cut off from Chile. Within 18 months Germany expanded the air-nitrogen production in the country by the investment of approximately $100,000,000 and the employment of an additional 300,000 continuous horsepower. To-day she is independent of all outside sources of nitrogen, and will continue so throughout all time.

The allies have approximately 500,000 continuous horsepower engaged exclusively in the fixation of air nitrogen for explosives, and, furthermore, air-nitrogen nitric-acid plants are now being actively installed all over the allied countries of Europe, notwithstanding the sea is open to them for the transport of saltpeter from Chile. The shortage of sea bottoms makes Chile highly undesirable and expensive as a source of nitrogen supply even to the allies.

The United States is about the only country in the world which is without the air-nitrogen industry; Japan, Norway, Sweden, Germany, France, Austria, Italy, and Switzerland together conduct the industry on an enormous scale, employing 1,000,000 continuous horsepower, involving an investment of $150,000,000, and an annual production which in normal times has a value of $78,000,000. The greatest water-power center in the world, with which none other compares, is Niagara Falls, where at this time more power is being developed than ever in its history, namely, somewhat in excess of 450,000 continuous horsepower. This is equivalent to about one-half of what the countries outside of the United States are consuming every second of the year in the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen.

These facts should have our earnest consideration, for we are here dealing with the greatest single factor affecting a nation's economic prosperity in times of peace and its power of defense and offense in times of war.

It may be said that we can secure a suitable supply of nitrogen for war purposes from the investment of private capital. The amendment that I have sent to the clerks' desk seeks to give the Government of the United States the control of this situation at least so far as the Government supply of powder is concerned.

This morning one of the great powder companies of this country proposed to the Congress of the United States that it control the water power of this country, in order that it might furnish the nitrogen to defend the Nation against foreign attack.

Mr. President, it was only a few weeks ago that the Senate of the United States thought the question of such grave importance that it invaded the business of a private corporation by passing a bill to establish an armor-plate factory, believing that we could not depend entirely on a private corporation to stand for the national defense in time of war. To-day it is proposed that in the inception of this question, in the very beginning of the development of this air-nitrogen industry in this country, we shall turn over the national defense, so far as making powder is concerned, and the natural resources of this country, in so far as water power is needed, to a private corporation and rely on its patriotism to furnish nitrogen to defend our country against a foreign attack in times of war.

Can we do it? I am not one of those who would tie up the natural resources of this country to an extent that they can not be used. I have never had any sympathy with those who believe in that conservation that means the obstruction of the development of our natural resources. I have never believed that we are conserving the natural resources of the United States for the benefit of the people of the United States by saying that we will let the water of the great falls of this country run downhill and be unused for fear that some one may get the advantage of it.

I do say that if the Congress of the United States is unwilling to exercise this power and allow the Government of the United States to develop these powers for the benefit of the people of the United States, then you had better allow a private corporation to develop them rather than to go on and let the power be wasted and the opportunity go by and leave your Nation without defense in time of war.

But I say that is unnecessary. The opportunity is here, and the Congress of the United States can legitimately allow the Government to act in this matter so far as it is a governmental function.

To create this power you must do so in the navigable streams of the United States. It is within the power of the Government of the United States to make those great streams navigable for commerce, and in making those streams navigable for commerce you can build the dams that are necessary for the development of hydroelectric power to make your nitrogen and make your powder, and retain it in the hands of the Government for the benefit of the people of the United States. But you can not let this question go by.

This is not the first time that a private corporation has attempted to develop an air-nitrogen plant in the United States and has met with the power of obstruction. Some years ago a company that is now making air nitrogen in Canada, a very large quantity of nitrogen, asked the Congress of the United States to allow them to build a dam on the Coosa River in Alabama. The bill provided that they should build the dam and the locks and the works without cost to the United States Government. Interest at 5 per cent on their investment would have made the water power cost for interest alone $7.50 for each horsepower developed, and it is said the water powers in Norway are developed for the same purpose so cheaply as to make the total cost for power from $3 to $5 per horsepower. They proposed to make over 20 miles of the river navigable without cost to the Government. They had options on land to build a nitrate works. They were preparing to make fertilizers for the farmers of the South in times of peace, and to have a plant that the Government could have taken over in times of war to furnish nitrogen for the making of powder in national defense.

Yet, because there was no provision in the bill to require that company to pay a dollar a horsepower tax for the use of that water, and the indefinite right of the Secretary of War to raise the tax as he saw fit in the future, the President of the United States vetoed the bill, and to-day if a first-class power declared war against your country and stopped the shipment of Chilean nitrates you could not last a year in defense of your country, because you would not have the power to make the powder that is necessary to supply your troops.

Mr. TILLMAN. To what President does the Senator from Alabama refer?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I refer to President Taft.

So I say, Mr. President, that, although I believe this is a Government function, the Government ought to develop this power, or so much of it as is needed, in the interest of the people; yet if you by your votes are unwilling to have the Government exercise this power, I would rather see a private corporation do it than to leave my country defenseless in time of war.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. STONE. The Senator from Alabama said there was a powder company—the Du Pont Powder Co.—which this morning proposed that it would furnish all the nitrogen that was necessary to make explosives if the Government would turn over its water power to that company.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes, sir.

Mr. STONE. Does the Senator from Alabama understand that the entire water power of the country should be turned over to that company?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No.

Mr. STONE. The Senator just remarked that the American Falls—I assume he meant the American part of the Niagara Falls—would produce practically half of all of the power used now by the other nations of the world in the production of nitrogen. If that be true, what is the need of turning over Coosa River or other great water powers to a private company?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I shall be glad to explain that to the Senator from my standpoint.

Niagara Falls is the greatest water power in the world, and, as I said, both the Canadian and the American Falls are producing to-day about one-half as much power as that which is being used for air-nitrogen purposes in Europe; but the Senator must bear in mind that the Congress of the United States has limited the development of the use of water power at Niagara, and that the development has about come up to that limitation. Therefore, without destroying those falls, you can not make a greater development at Niagara.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That development is also limited by the treaty with Great Britain.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is also limited by treaty with Great Britain.

Second, the power at Niagara is being used for purposes that can not be dispensed with. I do not mean to say that in times of war we could not dispense with anything; but looking at it from the standpoint of times of peace, great factories have been built there, and they are using that power; cities are being lighted by it, and street-car systems are being run by it. You can not justly take away the power of Niagara for the purpose of supplying the Government with an air-nitrogen plant. There are a great many places where hydroelectric power can be developed, but there are not many places that will fill the bill that presents itself to the Congress of the United States to-day.

The German Government, for the purposes of this war, I am informed—and reliably informed—is making 270,000 tons per annum of nitric acid, and our needs would be 180,000 tons.

Mr. TILLMAN. On what river is that power for the manufacture of this powder produced?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There is only about 20,000 of that horsepower which is used in this manufacture which is being produced by water power.

When the war broke out Germany found that the use of explosives was so great that, although she had the largest store of Chilean nitrates of any Government in the world, they were wiped up in a few months. She had then to resort to the expensive alternative of using steam to create the power to make electricity, and at a very high cost, because she had not developed her water powers and did not have the water powers to develop. But, coming back to the Senator's question, Germany, as I said, is producing at the rate of 270,000 tons of nitric acid per annum for her military needs. I take it, it would at least be conservative to say that if we became involved in war with a first-class power we would need at least two-thirds of the supply of powder that Germany alone is using to-day.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Let me finish this sentence. Two-thirds of the nitric acid Germany is using to-day would require 100,000 horsepower to create by the cyanamide process. Now I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I agree with the views of the Senator from Alabama that the Government should itself manufacture anything, I may say, that is necessary for its own defense. It was upon that theory—and because I believe in that principle—that I voted for the armor-plant bill; but the Senator from Alabama couples with that proposition, as I understand his amendment, the proposition that the Government shall go into private trade and supply nitrogen to the farmers.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will come to that in a moment. I will say to the Senator that I do not want to take up that question now, because I am on another branch of the subject.

Mr. WORKS. I only wished to ask the Senator if he was going to consider the question of the constitutional right of the Government to enter into that sort of trade. I am not disagreeing with the principle that the Senator has indicated.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think I can satisfy the Senator from California when I come to it, but I will ask him to excuse me from answering the question now, because I want to answer this other question.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] has asked me whether it was necessary for the Government to take all of the water power. No; but the Government, if it is going to manufacture air nitrogen economically, ought to manufacture it at one plant, at one place. Of course, the Government could assemble a large number of small powers and accomplish the results; but if it wants to do it economically it ought to have but one nitrogen plant and all the accessory works. Therefore, the Government should look for a place where it can develop something like 100,000 or 125,000 horsepower.

To develop 180,000 tons of nitric acid by the lime-nitrogen process or the cyanamide process would take 100,000 horsepower; but, to be on the safe side, you should estimate something like 120,000 or 130,000 horsepower to produce 180,000 tons of nitric acid. If you take the arc process, the process that is owned by the Du Pont Powder Co. so far as the rights in America are concerned, you would need a great deal more power, because it takes a half horsepower to the ton of nitric acid made by the cyanamide process, where it takes three horsepower to a ton of nitric acid made by the arc process; in other words, the arc process requires six times as much power to develop the same amount of nitrogen.

Well, what is the economy of the situation? First, in further answering the question of the Senator from Missouri, I will say that, if we must have for this purpose the development of water powers in this country, where at least 100,000 horsepower can be developed at one plant, and where that plant is accessible to railroads and to the transportation of its products, there are comparatively few places in the United States where you can locate a plant of that kind. If the Government is not willing to go in itself and investigate the question, as I am asking it to do, and determine where these locations are, and what are the best locations for a Government plant, and let it go by for private capital to develop, then private capital naturally will take these places of great power possibilities, and when the Government wakes up they will be found in the hands of private capital. What I am asking the Senate of the United States to do to-day is to take advantage of this opportunity and to authorize a responsible board to investigate and report the question back to us.

But look at the economy of it. Suppose you make up your mind that you are not going to develop air nitrogen for this purpose; that you are not going to follow the lead of the great powers of Europe and develop this industry, but that you are still going to rely on Chilean saltpeter. I am informed that the amount of Chilean saltpeter that we have in this country at the present time to defend our country against a foreign attack is not one-twentieth of the supply that the German Government had available when this great debacle in Europe took place—not 5 per cent have you in your storehouses to-day to defend your country against a foreign attack. The picket is asleep at his post, and the Congress of the United States occupies the picket line.

It is economy to make this development. I take it that the Government of the United States is not going to continue to carry in this country only one-twentieth of the Chilean nitrate supply which Germany carried at the outbreak of the present war. I will assume that Congress would be willing to buy and store up as much Chilean nitrate as Germany had when the war came on, which supply only lasted her a few months, and cost her $30,000,000. The interest on $30,000,000 at 3 per cent amounts to $900,000; but you have to take the fire risk, whether you have insurance or not, and Chilean saltpeter is a very inflammable material and there is a great deal of risk in connection with it. You have to pay for its storage, and, more than that, it depreciates in value and you have the loss of depreciation. So I take it that the cost to the Government would not be 3 per cent of what you borrow your money for, but to the 3 per cent would be added the fire risk, the storage, and the depreciation, which, altogether, would amount at least to 5 per cent per annum. Five per cent per annum on $30,000,000 is $1,500,000. But there is no fire risk in developing a water power, no cost for storage, and $1,500,000 is the interest, at 3 per cent, on $50,000,000.

I do not ask you to take my word as to what $50,000,000 will do in the development of such power. I am asking the Senate of the United States to adopt an amendment which will authorize the executive branch of this Government to investigate this question, and find out what an expenditure of that amount will do; but I will say to you that I have investigated it; and $50,000,000 will harness up a water power in this country which will produce 125,000 or 130,000 horsepower every second in the day and every day in the year—130,000 primary power. I do not say that on my own authority; I say it from the reports of the engineers of the War Department. That power can be developed for $14,500,000, and with much less than the balance of the $50,000,000 you can build air nitrogen plants, conversion plants, and every other kind of plant which is necessary to create a supply of 180,000 tons of nitric acid a year for the Government of the United States.

A moment ago the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] addressed to me a pertinent question. He asked me if I wanted to put the Government of the United States into the business of making fertilizers for farmers. Next to defending the country against a foreign enemy in time of war, I believe the most important thing is the developing and building up of the great agricultural interests of our country. It would not be necessary to enter that field unless the Government wanted to do so; but if the Government develops this power and holds it in its hands, there may be many years pass when it will not need the power for the purpose of making nitric acid. In times of peace if we have our plant built, our capacity to make nitrogen established, and a reasonable supply on hand for the moment, we do not want our power to lie idle and stop the wheels of the machinery; we do not want the plant which is making nitrogen to be unused; we do not want to go on making 180,000 tons of nitric acid a year in times of peace. What we want is the power to produce that commodity in time of war, and with that power and with that capacity why should we not either sell the nitrogen to those who are engaged in the fertilizer business to make fertilizers, or sell the power to those who want to use it, in order that they may make fertilizers out of it for the benefit of the great farming interests of this country?

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator was mistaken in saying that I inquired of him whether or not he wanted to do these things. I think a great many of us would like to see something of that kind done. The question in my mind was whether the Government had any power to enter into a business of that kind, and not whether or not we should desire to have it done. I asked that question partly because there are other bills pending here, one of them which has been very recently considered in one of the committees, proposing to assist, for example, irrigation districts of the country organized within the States, and therefore I have had some reason to inquire into that subject and to consider not only the question as to the power of the Government in dealing with a matter of that kind, but as to the policy of doing it. It is for that reason that I should be glad to hear from the Senator on that branch of the subject.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the Senator stated a moment ago that he agreed with the policy if we had the power. Now, as to the power. We may not have, and probably do not have, the power to develop a great water power for the purpose of making and furnishing the farmers of the United States fertilizer in time of peace, but we have the power to make a stream navigable; and that is what we do if we develop any navigable stream. We have the right to take the power developed on that navigable stream and to use it for a war purpose. That war power would embrace the right to make nitric acid and nitrogen, if nitrogen is necessary for the country's defense; and, if it is necessary for the country's defense, we have the right to pursue it further and carry the nitrogen into powder.

The other day the Senator from California and I voted together to build an armor-plate factory under the war power. We do not disagree on that. When you have taken such action under a war power and the war power exists, is it necessary to let your plant rot down in times of peace? Is it necessary to let the water run to waste because you do not have to make powder that day and hour? Can you not rent that power or rent that plant, which you are holding back with the strong arm of the Government for a war power in the time of emergency, to citizens of the United States for peace purposes, without violating the Constitution of the United States?

Take an example in this city. Some years ago down toward the Treasury Department Congress bought three blocks of land for the purpose of erecting Government buildings. That was a governmental power, but it has not erected the governmental buildings, and every day that I go down Pennsylvania Avenue I see those houses rented and the Government collecting the rents.

Mr. TILLMAN. And the Government is renting other buildings all over the city to house its departments.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly. I take it that nobody would contend that the Government of the United States has the right to go into the rental business; but having purchased the property for some other purpose, for a governmental purpose, it does not have to let the property lie idle and not be rented up to the time when it is ready to use it for the purposes for which it was purchased.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator permit me to observe that the War Department now leases water power on navigable streams to private concerns, and that within two weeks Congress has passed an act to cancel one of those leases because its terms seemed to be inequitable to the lessee?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly. So that I do not think there is any doubt about the power——

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an interruption?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In just a moment. I do not think there is any doubt about the power of the Government to develop these plants for war purposes; nor do I doubt the power in times of peace, when it is not necessary to use the plants for war purposes, to use them for the development of agriculture.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; and could not the Government just as legally operate them in times of peace, rather than let them lie idle?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think so; yes.

Mr. CLAPP. I wanted the Senator's expression on that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; I think so.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Alabama will pardon me, in times of peace part of the power would be used for Government purposes——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And it would be only the residue of it that would be used for something else?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will pardon me just there, I believe the estimate is that the nitrogen which we would require, with reasonable practice activity on the part of our Army and Navy, would cost $500,000 each year.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think that may be correct.

Mr. President, it may be asked why I inject this amendment into this bill. I did not intend to take a hand in this matter in the beginning; but I believe that the most important item that can go into a preparedness bill is the question of the supply of powder. You will not have a bill protecting your country against foreign attack until you have assured its powder supply.

This suggestion did not originate with me; it originated with the Government of the United States; in fact, I do not think you should ask the question why this amendment should go on the pending bill; but the real question which confronts the Senate of the United States is to ask the Committee on Military Affairs why it reported this great bill, increasing the Army of the United States 100,000 men and increasing its cost $150,000,000 a year without incorporating in the bill a provision for an adequate supply of powder in time of necessity. That is the question which confronts the Senate.

Mr. President, former Secretary of War Garrison, a patriotic and farseeing and able man, presented this question to the Congress of the United States for its consideration, and his presentation has been ignored.

In the 1915 annual report to Congress of former Secretary of War Garrison he says, in part:

> Military effectiveness requires ample quantities of the element (nitrogen), and the proper protection of national security behooves us to make provision for an adequate supply in time of war. Our only present source of supply is now the natural nitrate beds of Chile, which in time of war might be shut off from us. Obviously in the matter of munitions, especially where the source is so limited and localized, we should neglect no provision so easily available as to make the country self-sustaining. Plants producing nitrogen for industrial purposes in time of peace would be a great national asset in view of their availability to supply us with the necessary nitrogen in time of war.

That is what the Secretary of War of your country recommended to the Congress of the United States when he recommended that you increase the size of your present Army. But it did not rest there. Brig. Gen. William Crozier, Chief of Ordnance of the United States War Department, said, in his annual report for 1915, when you met here last December, this:

> In a country of even the very great natural resources of the United States there are nevertheless some articles essential in time of war for which it is dependent on a foreign source of supply. If these sources are so placed as to necessitate ocean transportation the possibility of being cut off from them is great enough to call for provision against it. I do not know of any article of this class which at the present time should cause more concern with reference to the war-time supply than nitric acid.

Not guns, not men, not airships, but nitric acid, says the Chief of Ordnance of the United States Army.

Then, after setting forth in some detail the impossibility of storing materials from which nitric acid is at the present time evolved, or providing for an assured supply in any such manner, Gen. Crozier goes on to say:

> These facts point to the necessity for an inquiry into the possibility of the establishment within the limits of the country of a source of supply of this war essential. Fortunately the possibility exists. There are in successful operation in Europe in several countries plants for the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen and the rendering of it available for use in the manufacture of nitric acid.

That is what I am asking you to do in this amendment. I am not asking you to go blindfolded and commit yourself to some unknown proposition. I am asking you to do what the Chief of Ordnance of the United States Army has asked you to do and recommended you to do; and I say the question is not as to whether this matter should be considered in this bill. The question before the United States Senate is why the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate has not reported a proposition of this kind to the Senate for consideration.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. HUSTING. I am very much interested in what the Senator is saying regarding the necessity of conserving our power supplies. I should like to ask the Senator whether he would not favor reserving in all water-power franchises the right to take possession of water powers developed under a lease from the United States in time of war, and during the continuance of the war to use them for the manufacture of nitrates, and then restore them to their owner and pay him a fair price, but aside from war profits, as proposed in an amendment to the so-called Shields bill, which I offered while the water-power bill was under discussion?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator that if war was on and the necessities of war required it, of course I would be willing to take anything; but that would involve great expense to the United States Government to take from private persons their private property and devote it to war uses when you have the power here to develop the necessary power that the Government needs, and let private capital develop power for its own purposes in other respects.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama further yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. HUSTING. I understand that under the plan of the Senator he would have the plant operated by private hands for the purpose of manufacturing fertilizers in times of peace, and that only in times of war would the Government resume possession of it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No.

Mr. HUSTING. I just want to ask the Senator whether that would not carry with it the idea that in times of peace it would be used for the purpose of manufacturing fertilizers, and only in time of war would it be used for the manufacture of nitrates and powder?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not say that I had a plan, so far as my amendment is concerned. The amendment simply seeks to have the United States Government, through its constituted authorities, investigate the question. I said this plant could be privately used when built and the United States Government could get back its interest, so that there would not be any cost to the Government, by either leasing it or using it for the purpose of making fertilizers. But it is not necessary to tie up all the water powers of the United States in order to get a few great powers that are necessary for this purpose.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have a suggestion to make to the Senator. I do it with great diffidence, because he is a lawyer and I am not; but I have some recollection of a general-welfare clause in the Constitution, something like this:

Congress shall have power * * * to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

And the Senator's amendment will do both.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, undoubtedly the national defense will justify it.

Mr. TILLMAN. I know it; and the other provision is right there—the general-welfare clause. God knows the production of food is for the general welfare, if I ever had any common sense.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. WEEKS. I was going to ask the Senator from Alabama if his attention had been called to the fact that private capital was supposed to be waiting to go into developments of this kind, provided the water-power bill passes?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, the private capital announced itself at the desk this morning, and I am coming to the private capital in a minute.

Mr. WEEKS. I was not aware that it had done so, but I have understood that private capital was prepared to go into the Columbia River development and other developments. Furthermore, I desire to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that a bill was reported to-day which has in view something of the contentions which he is making, introduced, I think, by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no fight to make on the bill of the Senator from South Carolina, but that seeks to have these water powers developed by the Government for agricultural purposes solely.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The Senator from Alabama, of course, would not like to make an incorrect statement.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, no.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The object of the bill was identically the object that the Senator seeks to accomplish in this amendment, but with a provision giving the Secretary of Agriculture the power to dispose of any surplus that there might be, as indicated by him, during times of peace. As we have got to make a certain amount during times of peace for the use of the Army, it is provided that the surplus may be used for fertilizer purposes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not fully understand the Senator's bill. I heard it read this morning.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That was the full purport of the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection to that. The only proposition I am standing here for is this: Here is your preparedness bill. Here is your national-defense bill. Your Secretary of War has warned you that it is necessary to supply nitrogen to defend your country in time of war, and the Chief of Ordnance of the United States Army has asked you to investigate the question. I say no preparedness bill has a right to go through this body without some provision of this kind being attached to it.

I am not wedded to the language of my amendment. If it could have been done otherwise, I would have offered no amendment myself. I think the amendment I have offered is a safe and sound one. If any other Senator has a better proposition to offer, I am willing to accept it; but I say it should be tied to this bill.

Here are some other authorities indicating why it should be tied to this bill:

Dr. L. H. Baekeland, one of the leading scientists and chemical engineers of the United States, a member of the Naval Consulting Board, is quoted in the New York Press of December 23, 1915, as follows:

The lack of nitric acid, the indispensable chemical in the manufacture of smokeless powder and high explosives, would cause the United States to be defeated in less than a year after war started with a first-class power, unless our Navy were more powerful than that of the enemy.

This Dr. Baekeland is one of the great chemists of this country. He is a member of the Naval Consulting Board of the United States, and he tells you that you could not stand out against an enemy a year because you have not got the nitrates with which to do it.

Mr. Howard E. Coffin, chairman of the committee on production, manufacturing, and standardization of the Naval Research Board, said, at a meeting of this board December 23, 1915, in speaking of preparedness:

One of the big things is our utter lack of nitrates.

Dr. Charles F. McKenna, former president of the American Institute of Chemical Engineers, in an article in the New York Times of January 23, entitled "Air furnishing raw materials for gunpowder," says, speaking of cyanamide:

Ammonia can be obtained from this compound by a very simple and cheap process. * * * Nitric acid can be made from ammonia, thus furnishing us with the opportunity to make nitrates as demanded from their ammonia, sodium, potash, lime, barium, or other base. It is very probable that all of these necessary reactions do not cost as much to bring about as does the arc reaction in the Baekeland-Eyde and Pauling furnaces, because enormous power is there demanded and small yields obtained per unit of produce.

Prof. Joseph W. Richards, dean of the chemical faculty of Lehigh University and secretary of the American Electro-Chemical Society, in a paper entitled "Nitric acid from the air as a factor in preparedness for war," delivered at Lehigh University January 27, 1916, said:

Germany has had to supply her own munition and nitric acid, to accomplish which the Teutons have created a large industry which manufactures nitric acid from the air. Over half a million horsepower is used in producing it. The United States at this time has not a single nitric-acid plant in operation.

Dr. Thomas H. Norton, Ph. D., Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, Washington, D. C., another man connected with your Government, writing in the Scientific American of March 4, 1916, under the title of "The American conquest of the air," says, in part:

The heaviest tribute is paid to foreign countries for our supply of combined nitrogen. Imperatively necessary for a multitude of industries, and above all for maintaining the fertility of our farms. The tribute has amounted annually to over $29,000,000. Every cent of this sum should have remained within our own borders. * * * In this ultimate analysis a war is reduced to the simple term of nitric acid. The nation engaged in struggle for life and death becomes helpless the day this stock of nitric acid is exhausted, no matter what its population may number, no matter what their bravery, skill, and resoluteness. * * * And now, in 1916, this country is without a single factory of industrial rank occupied with the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen. We still pay a heavy tribute to foreign producers of nitrogen in combined form. We are still exposed to the dangers of widespread disaster for a multitude of interests should communication with Chile be severed.

Robert G. Skerrett, writing in the Iron Age of February 10, 1916, on "The fixation of atmospheric nitrogen," says:

It is the cyanamide process that Germany has turned to. * * * Cyanamide can be manufactured anywhere within our boundaries where there is water power that can be developed cheaply and which can be reached by rail. * * * However, the Government must come to the rescue of the industry, no matter what the process, and at least make it possible for manufacturers to have available an abundance of cheap water power.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. When was that article written?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. This article was published in the Scientific American on the 4th day of March, 1916—this very month.

Mr. OVERMAN. There is one plant in South Carolina which is doing very well. It is nearly on the North Carolina border. It is a small plant.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think that is making air nitrogen. It is now experimenting with phosphate, and not nitrogen.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to say to the Senator from Alabama that there is a plant at a place that has assumed the name, in part, of the product—Nitrolee, S. C.—and I saw in one of the scientific journals the statement that they are producing atmospheric nitrogen; but I have not been able yet, although I have made some efforts, to find out just what is their capacity or what system they use in the production.

Mr. OVERMAN. They use the arc system, as I understand.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I understand the proposition, I think I know the plant the Senator speaks of, and I think it is a small experimental plant that has been erected by Mr. Duke, or those interested with him. Is not that the plant?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That is correct.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And the total expenditure there is about $150,000 up to this time. It is a mere experimental plant, and it is not experimenting with nitrogen. It is phosphate with which the experiments are being made.

Mr. OVERMAN. I telegraphed them when the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] made the same statement, and I received a reply to the effect that there was a plant there, and that they were doing a fine business, and yet it was a comparatively small plant.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is only an experimental business, which failed. So that what this gentleman says about there being no air-nitrogen plants in this country is an absolute fact, although under the present high price for nitric acid, two and a half times the normal, this experimental plant may have resumed and be producing 2 or 3 tons per day.

Mr. F. J. Tone, works manager of the Carborundum Co., and a recognized authority in electrochemistry, speaking at a meeting of the Niagara Falls section of the American Electro-Chemical Society on February 22 last, said:

To-day nitrogen products are unquestionably the most important products in the field of chemistry. Without them modern warfare as we know it would be impossible, because they are an essential element in every explosive. * * * They are necessary in the life of an agricultural nation at all times, and, as a matter of common foresight, the production of artificial nitrates should to-day be made an established industry in America. * * * This at once calls for cheap electric power in the center of good transportation facilities, and in brief terms it means that we must have Niagara power in large amounts and at low costs.

Mr. President, as I said in the beginning, I think the question is not why this amendment should be placed in this bill, but why it has not been placed in this bill. The House Committee on Military Affairs reported a bill to that branch of Congress which contains this provision:

SEC. 82. That to provide for the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen by the development of water power, or any other means, necessary to establish an adequate supply of nitrogen, the appropriation of such sum or sums of money to construct the necessary plant for such purpose is hereby authorized.

In other words, they did not provide for a plant; they did not provide for a supply; but they put in the preparedness bill a provision authorizing the Congress to act, so that they could have laws inserted in the great appropriation bills in the future for the building of a plant of this kind, and create a supply of nitrogen.

I say, Mr. President, without the expectation of contradiction, that that provision in the House bill to guard this country against the danger of a foreign enemy in time of war was defeated by the Powder Trust, the Republican Party, and certain gentlemen who called themselves conservationists.

Look at the record in the House of Representatives. Every member of the Republican Party who voted on the question, except so many as I could count on the fingers of one hand, voted to strike that provision out of the House bill. On the Democratic side of the House there were in the neighborhood of 20 men who voted with the Republican Party to strike it out. Practically every man who voted to strike it out calls himself a conservationist.

This was not any question of preventing a private corporation from exploiting the people of the United States. This was a question of the Government of the United States having the power, in its own appropriation bills, to protect itself against a common enemy. It required no limitation on legislation, because under the proposal in the House bill the Government was to do the work itself.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. WARREN. I have no desire to enter at present into the political part of the remarks of the Senator regarding the House. I had understood—of course, the Senator may be better advised than I am—that it was the indefiniteness of the House proposal that ruled against it, rather than any other factor. Of course, that section meant little, as the Senator knows, in the way of carrying out what he now wishes to be done, and which he is so ably presenting. It was entirely loose, and meant nothing except the desire of those who voted for it that something should be done.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly. It was the desire of those in charge of the bill that something should be done, and they went as far as they thought they could go. I am sure the objection that was raised would not appeal to the Senator from Wyoming, because I know he realizes the importance of this great question to the Nation; but the Senator is wrong in his conclusion about this matter, because if it were a question of the section being so indefinite as not to fairly cover the subject it was open to amendment, and the men who struck it out did not try to amend the phraseology or the language of the bill.

Now, I have said—and I am not trying to make this a political issue, but I am trying to state the facts as I understand them——

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator has given this matter so much attention that I presume he is of the opinion that it is pretty well understood by Senators and Members. I want to assure the Senator that the subject is a very new one to most people. I doubt if there are 50 Members in the other body or a quarter of the Members in this body who have given it any such study as the Senator has, or who know anything about it except that there is a way of obtaining this nitric acid through the construction of such a plant as the Senator names.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I agree with the Senator thoroughly in his statement. Now, I am not charging any ulterior motive to his colleagues in the Republican Party at the other end of this Capitol when they voted against that section. I think most of them voted against this provision because they did not understand it. If I can do so, I am going to try to see that the Republicans, as well as the Democrats on this side of the Chamber, hear something about this question.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator is placing it before the Senate in a manner that I think we all appreciate, and he undoubtedly will have attention.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I happen to know something about this question, because I was one of those who some years ago tried to pass what was known as the Coosa Dam bill, and did pass it up to President Taft's veto. I want to say of President Taft that I do not think he understood the importance of the question when he vetoed the bill or he would not have done so. But I realized then the importance of nitrates to the American people and the Government of the United States, and I have studied the question since, and I am not willing for it to go by at this time without giving it the consideration that I think it deserves.

I stated that it was not only the Republican Party in the House and the conservationists who voted against this measure, but it met with the opposition of the Powder Trust.

Mr. STONE. It has been suggested while the Senator has been talking that the opposition in the House was predicated upon some contention that this proposal had relation to the Coosa Dam. I can not understand why it has any such relation. The Senator has just referred to that, and I want to know if it has any connection with any particular enterprise.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. None whatever. It has no connection with the Coosa Dam proposition. You could not build a dam on the Coosa River that would be big enough to supply the Government of the United States with the power it needs to make nitrates needed in time of war. That dam ought to be built, but it could not be built for this purpose. It could be built to make a small amount of nitrogen to supply people who were manufacturing fertilizers, but it could not be used for this governmental purpose.

There has been an effort to defeat the Government going into this business because the private corporations want to take charge of supplying the Government of the United States with its powder and its nitrates, and hold that control. Many statements have been made which were not borne out by the facts.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish to ask the Senator one question. I know he has investigated this matter thoroughly. What is the difference between the cost per pound of nitrate manufactured under his plan and the cost of saltpeter and nitrates brought from Chile?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I understand, and as I am informed—I am not a chemist, but I have studied the question and I have my information from some good chemists—it depends on the process. If you take the arc process, it may make the cost more to make nitric acid from the air in this country than from Chilean saltpeter. In Norway they have cheaper power than in this country, and there the arc process has been successful in a limited way. If you take the lime-nitrogen or cyanamide process, it requires approximately one-sixth of the power of the arc process and you can make it at about one-half of what you can make nitric acid with Chilean saltpeter.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand, then, it would be much cheaper.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It would be cheaper.

Mr. OVERMAN. There is another question I wish to ask. I understand that it is controlled by patents, and the Government would have to secure patents to manufacture it. Where are those patents controlled?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There is the Du Pont Co., which seeks to get your permission to harness up some of your streams for its use by the bill introduced this morning. This company owns the American rights to the arc process.

Mr. TILLMAN. Who owns the cyanamide?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The American Cyanamid Co. owns the right, and they have associated companies in Europe.

My amendment to this bill seeks to take care of this question. It does not commit the Government to any process or any policy, but it authorizes the Board of Government Engineers to see what contracts may be made with these people for manufacturing or for the use of their patent rights or their processes, and the engineers will report it back to you to determine whether or not it will do it.

Mr. TILLMAN. When will that board report?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The amendment says it shall report at as early a date as practicable.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not until after we add your amendment to the bill. That is the first step.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is the first step necessary. But I am getting far afield. I do not like to make a charge here against a great corporation, and in whatever I am saying I do not wish to be understood as reflecting upon the Du Pont Powder Co. It conducts a legitimate business. It is a great corporation. It naturally wants to control its line of industry, and it does not want the Government or anybody else to get into business with it. It had the right to oppose this bill if it wanted to. It has a right to have its agents around the Senate opposing my amendment if it wants to. But I say that the Senate of the United States, looking to the interest of the people of the United States, have not a right to let the Du Pont Powder Co. defeat my amendment, even if it does oppose the interests of that company. I am asking for only an investigation by a board of Army engineers coming from a corps in the Army that has handled millions on millions of Government money and holds the proud record that in the life of the corps there has been but one man who could be bought or who went wrong. Why should we not have the light? I am asking for only the light.

I send to the clerks' desk a clipping I cut out of this morning's Washington Post in reference to the powder company and I ask the Secretary to read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

OFFER A NITRATE PLANT—DU PONTS WILL SPEND $20,000,000 IF CONGRESS CHANGES LAWS—COUNSEL LAY PROJECT BEFORE SECRETARY BAKER—WANT THE WATER-POWER STATUTES ALTERED.

Counsel for the E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co. informed Secretary Baker at the War Department yesterday that the company stood ready to build a great hydroelectric plant for taking nitric acid from the air and to make its products available to the Government for the manufacture of explosives, at prices fixed by the Secretary of War, if Congress would change existing water-power laws so as to make such a project practicable.

Mr. Baker was given a letter from Pierre S. du Pont, president of the company, attaching a proposed bill to provide for 50-year leases on water-power sites in navigable streams.

It was explained that the company contemplated constructing a plant costing $20,000,000 or more and capable of furnishing all the nitrates now imported from Chile. Secretary Baker last night declined to say what would be his attitude toward the project.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, that is reported in the paper this morning. It is followed up by the introduction of a bill here in which the Du Pont Powder Co. at the opening of this discussion, the day this amendment is to be debated, come here and ask you to give them the pick of water powers in this country to develop nitrogen for their business. I am willing for them to have water powers, but I am not willing for them to have the pick of the water powers. I am willing for them to have the water powers on the same terms that you let other people have water powers. You passed a water-power bill at the present session with limitations or terms on which private corporations and individuals can use these powers far more drastic than anything in the bill which was read at the clerks' desk this morning. Why should not the Du Pont Powder Co. stand on all fours for its rights to water powers with the other corporations and the people of the United States?

That is not all. I send to the clerks' desk and ask to have read an interview with Mr. Hudson Maxim on this subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNITED STATES MUNITION PLANT SCHEME CALLED "PORK"—HUDSON MAXIM SAYS VENTURE WOULD RUIN HONEST INDUSTRY FOR POLITICAL PROFIT.

WASHINGTON, February 29.

From within the circle of President Wilson's Naval Advisory Board to-day came strong condemnation of the plan for Government manufacture of war munitions, expressed by Hudson Maxim in a pamphlet entitled "The colossal folly of the proposition for the Government to make all war munitions," published by the American Defense Society. Mr. Maxim also is a member of the board. Incidentally, a bill for Government manufacture of armor plate has been favorably reported by the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs.

In his latest contribution to the campaign for "preparedness," Mr. Maxim takes direct issue with those who urge erection of Government plants for the manufacture of war materials, and says this is only another scheme to provide "pork" for the "pork-barrel politicians."

"There is a nation-wide movement to have all war munitions manufactured by the Government," writes Mr. Maxim. "The movement originated with the pacifists, it being their object, as they claim, to take the profit out of the war.

"It is their belief that no man possibly can be honest or patriotic or possess any humanity or conscience unless he can possess these laudable qualities without loss of profit.

"What does it mean to the politicians to nationalize the manufacture of munitions of war? It means a great fruitage of political plums for their use and behoof. It will be the politicians who will have the sole say as to where the great Government works are to be located, and they are sure to be located not with respect to advantages of manufacture and safety in time of war, but where they will be the most advantageous as pawns for political profit, the same as has proven true with all Government works.

"In short, the manufacture of munitions of war will be taken from the hands of honest industry and placed in the hands of dishonest politicians."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, in connection with the newspaper clipping which has just been read, it may be appropriate, with the Senator's permission, to read a special dispatch to the World sent from St. Louis three or four months ago:

PREPAREDNESS MEN PREPARE TO RESIGN—ADVERTISEMENTS OF $10,000,000 MUNITIONS CORPORATION SHOCKS ST. LOUIS.

ST. LOUIS.

Many members have resigned and others are threatening to resign from the committee of one hundred appointed by Mayor Kiel to urge the preparedness program upon Congress. This action resulted from advertisements in St. Louis newspapers this morning of a $10,000,000 Maxim munitions corporation offering stock for sale at $10 a share. Hudson Maxim appeared two days ago before the Business Men's League to urge support of the national defense program.

"That's a pretty swift beginning," said former Solicitor General of the United States Frederick W. Lehmann, in announcing his refusal to serve on the committee.

"One can not help suspecting an ulterior motive," said Judge H. S. Caulfield, in declining to be a committeeman.

"If the activities of the National Security League, at the instance of which the committee was appointed, the appearance of Mr. Maxim, and the promulgation of the advertisements can be connected, it is treasonable," said John H. Gundlach, former president of the city council and member of the committee.

I take the Hudson Maxim referred to in the clipping and in this special telegram to be one and the same man.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think so.

Mr. JONES. I wish to ask the Senator if this Maxim is the Maxim who collaborated in the preparation of the "Battle Cry of Peace" we have heard so much about?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think so.

Now, Mr. President, who is this Hudson Maxim? We all know he is a great engineer, a great man, a great inventor; but we also know another thing, that he is one of the consulting engineers of the Du Pont Powder Co., which fought the House provision, and in order to bring the Members of the House or the Senate of the United States in contempt he says that any man who would advance a proposition of this kind is a pork-barrel politician. A pork-barrel politician is what this private corporation's agent calls men who have the temerity to stand on the floor of the House or the Senate and see that the American people have some rights and that those rights are protected.

More than that, I know another great engineer in their employ; not personally, but I know of him. He is one of the greatest hydroelectric engineers in the United States and a man of high character, too, I understand. That is Mr. Hugh L. Cooper, of New York.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me to correct him? He is Mr. Hugh Cooper, of Minnesota. He is a native of Minnesota.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Hugh Cooper, of Minnesota, is one of the consulting engineers of the Du Pont Powder Co. The Du Pont Powder Co. secured the American rights, or the option to the American rights, of one of these processes. They went out to hunt for power. They did not find any entirely satisfactory to them in the United States, and they were going to Canada, when the proposal was made in the House bill that the Government should develop its power for nitrates. Mr. Hugh Cooper was their consulting engineer. When this question came before the House I know that Mr. Hugh Cooper came to Washington and stated that this provision in the House bill could not be enacted into law. He knew more about it than you do, and he was right; it could not be enacted into law. I know more than that. The Powder Trust had other agents here acting for them. I will not call the names; it is not necessary. In what I said about Mr. Maxim and Mr. Hugh Cooper I am not in any way reflecting on them. They are the employees or have been the employees of this great corporation. They had a right to shrug their shoulders and reflect on men who take the view that I do and prevent if possible men taking the view I do from accomplishing any results. I do not charge these men with any improper conduct. I say they came here to defeat this legislation, and they have succeeded so far.

More than that, the Du Pont Powder Co. had its employees in this town when the bill was pending before the House fighting the bill. So far as I know they may be here to-day for the same purpose. They have a right to be; but the people of the United States have a right to know what this issue is and who are opposing it.

Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate to what it has been costing the people of the United States to secure these nitrates. The records of the Department of Commerce show that the imports of sodium nitrate from Chile into the United States from the year 1867 to May, 1915, were 8,040,271 tons, costing $261,990,000. The importations have been constantly increasing, and amounted in the year 1913 to 589,136 tons, costing $20,718,968 for that one year.

The Government of Chile levies an export tax on sodium nitrate that equals in our money $11.60 a ton, which would amount to $6,833,977 on the imports coming into the United States in 1913. The Government of Chile has collected on sodium nitrates coming into the United States since the beginning $90,000,000. In other words, if you continue to get your supply of nitrates for your powder from Chile, the Government of the United States must pay a tribute to the Chilean Government of $11.60 a ton. If your farmers continue to get their nitrates for their fertilizers from Chile, they have to pay to the Chilean Government $11.60 a ton for every ton of nitrate that goes into their fertilizers.

As I said, in one year we paid the Chilean Government over $6,800,000. Six million eight hundred thousand dollars is 3 per cent a year on $227,000,000. Half of $227,000,000 would build an air-nitrogen plant, couple up the water power in the running streams of America, and make your rivers navigable and supply the farmers of the United States with their present needs of nitrogen for fertilizer purposes and save far more than the tribute we now pay the Chilean Government and the cost of transportation to our shores.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And the Government with powder.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And the Government with powder, and produce it at half the cost.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I have not had the pleasure of hearing the Senator's entire speech, but has the Senator given any facts upon the comparative cost to the farmer of nitrogen produced by air and the nitrogen brought from Chile?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I stated that if the arc process under the expensive water powers of this country would probably cost more, but under the lime-nitrogen process, which only takes about one-sixth of the amount of horsepower, the nitric acid could be produced for about one-half the cost if made out of Chilean nitrate.

But that is not the only question involved here. Food is the most important question to the American people. The cost of food in the United States increased from 1896 to 1912, 80 per cent. The advance in the general cost of living during this period was 59 per cent in the United States and approximately 40 per cent in Europe. The Bureau of Labor has just reported that the cost of living is now 15 per cent higher than it was two years ago, due largely to the increased cost of food products.

I can show you, and expect to show you, that the only way you can reduce the cost of food products and at the same time give the farmers of the United States a chance to make a fair living is by the increased use of cheap fertilizers, and cheap fertilizers mean cheap water power.

Some of you gentlemen who have advocated in all good faith from your standpoint—I am not criticizing your argument—that the Government of the United States should tax its water power for this purpose must bear in mind that every dollar of tax that you put on hydroelectric horsepower when it is being used for this purpose means the increased cost of the nitrates that go into the fertilizers for the farmers' use, and instead of increasing the price of your power as created by the Government of the United States, so long as it gets a fair interest on its money invested, it ought to furnish the power as cheaply as it can, if it has a guaranty that the cheap power will mean cheap nitrates and cheap fertilizers.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senate spent about an hour to-day in undertaking to provide an investigation as to the high cost of gasoline. In view of the fact the Senator has stated that the price of food products has greatly increased during the past year, does he not think it would be better for us to devote our time to investigating that subject and see if we can not get cheap food rather than cheap gasoline?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will stand for cheap food rather than cheap gasoline, but I would like to see both.

From 1900 to 1910, as shown by the United States census, the population of the United States increased 21 per cent, and its crop production only 10 per cent.

The importation of foodstuffs and live animals doubled, and the exportation of wheat and flour dropped from 31 per cent of their production to 13 per cent. The cost of living and the productivity of the soil is identically the same thing, and if we go on without increasing the productivity of the soil of our country by cheap fertilizers this condition will continue.

Now, take the example of Germany. Germany can be referred to as pointing out European agricultural practice. She has increased in 20 years her grain crops 15 bushels to the acre. In the same time the United States has increased its grain crop 3 bushels to the acre. The potato crop has increased in Germany 80 bushels to the acre; in the United States 24 bushels.

Germany's acre yield is practically double that of corresponding crops in the United States; and why? Germany uses four or five times as much fertilizer per acre cultivated as we use. If the farmers of the United States had a cheap fertilizer and used it over the cultivated area of the United States at the rate Germany uses fertilizer, there would be a net gain above the cost of fertilizer of $1,000,000,000 a year. The sure and safe way to obtain cheap fertilizer is to use the water power of America, that is now going to waste, to fix nitrogen out of the air.

Mr. President, I hold in my hand an article prepared by Mr. Frank S. Washburn, one of the great engineers of this country, who is connected with the American Cyanamid Co., which he wrote and furnished to the Secretary of Agriculture, David Franklin Houston, on the nitrogen problem. I intended to read to the Senate extracts from this paper, showing the necessity of the development of water power for cheap nitrogen on behalf of agriculture, but, as I understand it is not contrary to the rules of the Senate to insert as a part of my remarks an article prepared by somebody else, I ask unanimous consent that I may do so as to this article.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article referred to is as follows:

THE NITROGEN PROBLEM.

[Compiled for Hon. David Franklin Houston by Frank S. Washburn, Jan. 29, 1916.]

Without fixed nitrogen the earth would soon become an uninhabitable desert waste. Sir William Crookes, the English chemist and economist, declared that the food supply of the world is dependent upon the supply of nitrogen. It is absolutely necessary to the existence of animal and plant life. We live in it, we breathe it, we eat it, and it enters into the composition of the human body. Nitrogen is a constituent of all organized life and tissues. In a free state it is a colorless, tasteless, odorless, gaseous, nonmetalic element. The atmosphere enveloping the globe consists chiefly of nitrogen, which constitutes 78 per cent of its volume and 75.5 per cent of its weight. It has been estimated that the column of air resting upon each square yard of the earth's surface contains 6.4 net tons of nitrogen. The material is abundant; in fact, it is unlimited; but as Dr. Thomas H. Norton has said, "The nitrogen problem of the day is the difficulty to bring it into a form available for the wants of mankind."

The atmospheric nitrogen above 1 square mile of land, amounting to about 20,000,000 tons, is equivalent to what the world will require in the next 50 years at the present rate of consumption. Of this enormous reserve a minute fraction—about 0.000002—is in the active service of the vegetable and animal kingdoms. In the soil, in the form of nitrate, it is a chief factor of plant food. From the plants it passes into the bodies of animals, whence it returns to the soil. Through the action of bacteria, with the aid of certain legumes, and by electrical discharges in the air, a corresponding amount is constantly brought into a combined form and enters the cycle of changes. The amount of this "nomadic" nitrogen, as it has aptly been termed, is on an average about three-fourths of an ounce for each square yard of land.

The actual consumption of nitrogen in its cruder forms in the United States in 1910 was 283,496,000 pounds, valued at approximately $45,000,000 (wholesale), of which more than $32,000,000 worth was imported.

In the United States the per capita consumption is at present only a little over one-half that for Germany. It is, however, rapidly growing, and the annual sum now sent abroad for the purpose of nitrogenous compounds has become even a more important item. The fact that the United States, in common with all civilized countries, and especially with all agricultural and manufacturing countries, is dependent upon the one natural source of nitrate in Chile, and the additional fact that the Chilean nitrate deposits are not particularly extensive and are destined at an early date to complete exhaustion, constitute another factor in the nitrogen problem.

The efforts that are being made to release the manufacturing and agricultural interests of the world from this dependence assume increasing importance each day in many European countries. During 1913 the United States imported 625,000 tons of Chilean nitrate, valued at $21,630,000, upon which the Chilean export duty was 60 per cent. Thus the people of the United States paid taxes to the Chilean Government of $8,000,000 for part of the nitrogen they consumed.

INCREASING DEMAND FOR FIXED NITROGEN.

Dr. Norton, in his monograph on the "Utilization of Atmospheric Nitrogen," says:

"During the middle of the nineteenth century a disturbing force came into play as the result of the increase of population in those countries where cereal foods are a staple element of diet, especially in Europe and North America. The methods provided by nature for maintaining a certain normal degree of fertility were no longer adequate in order to insure a sufficient supply of wheat and other cereals in various countries. In order to increase the yield of a given area of land, recourse was had to artificial fertilizers. The needed nitrogen was obtained partly from the ammonia secured as a by-product in the manufacture of gas, to some extent from accumulated deposits of guano, and largely from the remarkable deposits of sodium nitrate in Chile. For over half a century the consumption of both ammonium compounds and sodium nitrate has increased constantly. In addition to the demands of agriculture, modern chemistry calls for vast amounts of nitric acid and its derivatives. One-fifth of the Chilean nitrate now consumed in Europe goes into the manufacture of explosives, of coal-tar colors, and of other allied products."

In 1898 Sir William Crookes estimated that the bread eaters of Europe and America numbered 516,000,000, and were increasing at the rate of 6,000,000 annually. The acreage of cereals in that year was 167,000,000, and only 100,000,000 acres more were available for such cultivation. The annual per capita consumption of wheat was 4.6 bushels, and the average yield per acre was 12.8 bushels. From these figures he calculated that by 1941 the wheat fields of the world must cover 292,000,000 acres in order to meet the demands of a population of 819,000,000 bread eaters. During the period from 1900 to 1910 the population of the United States increased 21 per cent, but crop production increased only 10 per cent. Taking Germany as a good example of European agricultural practice, she has in 20 years increased her yield of grain crops 15 bushels to the acre, as compared with only 3 bushels for the United States. Her potato crop has been increased 80 bushels, compared with 24 bushels for this country. In general, German acre yields are approximately 80 per cent greater than for the corresponding crops in this country, and yet Germany has only one-fourth the acreage under cultivation that the United States has.

EXPERIMENTS WITH FERTILIZERS.

Ohio Experiment Station Circular No. 144 reports the results obtained in the twentieth year of a test under a judicious system of rotation and fertility maintenance. Where good tillage was supplemented by the addition of suitable fertilizers in profitable amounts, an expenditure of $17.60 for fertilizer per acre per five-year rotation returned an average total income of $35.23, or a net gain of $17.63 per acre for each five-year rotation.

Purdue Agricultural Experiment Station, La Fayette, Ind., reports in Circular No. 23, as follows:

"Experiments in 10 representative counties of Indiana have shown an average gain due to fertilization of wheat of 11.6 bushels per acre. The average cost per acre for fertilization was $4.14, leaving a net profit per acre of $7.46."

In Circular No. 25 the same station reports concerning their tests of fertilizers on corn, as follows:

"Experiments in 11 representative counties have shown on an average a gain due to corn fertilization of 7.7 bushels per acre. The average cost of fertilizer was $1.38 per acre, leaving a net profit of $1.71 per acre, or a net profit of $1.24 for every dollar invested in fertilizer."

After 30 years' experimenting the Pennsylvania State College of Agriculture finds that the judicious application of fertilizer on corn makes a 36 per cent gain in yield per acre, wheat makes a 74 per cent gain in yield per acre, oats makes a 31 per cent gain in yield per acre, hay makes a 54 per cent gain in yield per acre.

Dr. B. W. Kilgore, State chemist and director of test farms, North Carolina, is authority for the following:

"From 1886 to 1895 the average acre yield of cotton in North Carolina was 171 pounds of lint cotton; from 1896 to 1905, 199 pounds per acre; from 1906 to 1910, 215 pounds per acre. From 1866 to 1895 the average yield of cotton in North Carolina was at a standstill, and averaged annually for the 30 years 172 pounds per acre, while for the next 15 years—from 1896 to 1910—the annual average production of lint cotton was 204 pounds, or an increase of 32 pounds in 15 years, being little more than 2 pounds per acre of year. With cotton at 10 and 15 cents, respectively, this represents an almost net profit of 20 and 30 cents per acre per year of the 15 over the preceding one, the accumulated profit for the last year of the 15-year period being $3.20 per acre with cotton at 10 cents, and $4.70 with cotton at 15 cents.

"What I shall say will be based, in the main, not on causes or estimates but on actual yields or weights obtained in our experiment on the Iredell test farm, near Statesville, where the soil is a red clay loam, and on the Edgecombe test farm, where the soil is a fine sandy loam. These soils, with those which are closely related to them, are the main cotton lands of the State.

"The fertilizer used at both places contained 7 per cent available phosphoric acid and 2½ per cent each of nitrogen and potash. The results for no fertilizers and for different quantities of fertilizer were as follows:

Iredell test farm (red clay loam soil).

"The average profit from the use of fertilizer on cotton on the soils in the two sections of the State was $4.27 per 100 pounds of fertilizer.

"It will, I think, be difficult to find a farm operation which will yield a higher profit than this shows for cotton. It is a case where, after eating the cake, more than four cakes have been left or produced; after paying for the fertilizer itself, more than $4 profit has resulted for each dollar expended."

Prof. H. Erdmann compiled the following data from German experiments to show how easily the productivity of German farms could be still further increased:

[From Soil Improvement Committee Bulletin, National Fertilizer Association.]

Crops.	Present acreage.	Average crop per acre.	Possible crop by intensive culture.	Nitrogen to add per acre.	Additional crop obtained.
		Tons.	Tons.	Pounds.	Tons.
Rye	15,000,000	0.60	1.20	52.8	9,000,000
Wheat	6,000,000	.75	1.60	114.4	4,800,000
Oats	10,000,000	.69	1.52	88.0	8,000,000
Potatoes	8,000,000	5.20	12.00	105.6	40,000,000
Barley	2,500,000	.66	1.40	52.8	1,500,000

These proposed additions of nitrogen are supplementary to the quantities already employed in German agriculture to the extent of an average of 50 pounds per acre. To show the correctness of the figures advanced by Prof. Erdmann, the following table illustrates the rôle actually played by nitrogen in the cereal production of Europe, using the average figures of crop yields for the period from 1903 to 1907:

Countries.	Wheat.	Rye.	Barley.	Oats.	Nitrogen applied per acre.
	Tons.	Tons.	Tons.	Tons.	Pounds.
Germany	0.848	0.652	0.760	1.880	50.0
Austria	.492	.500	.548	.400	26.0
Hungary	.480	.460	.504	.452	24.0
France	.584	.456	1.000	1.000	31.0
Belgium	1.040	.720	.....	2.464	58.0
Portugal	.300	.....	.....	.....	3.5
Italy	.362	.360	.....	.328	.....

It is conceded by eminent authorities that an adequate supply of nitrogenous fertilizer, along with methods of intensive agriculture, will easily increase the yield of farm products per acre to such an extent that the present food problem of civilization can be advanced far into the next century.

USE OF FERTILIZERS WELL ESTABLISHED.

The history of the use of fertilizers has proved without a doubt that they have an essential and economic place in good agriculture. Within the last 20 years, Dean Price, of Ohio State University, tells us, Germany has increased her crop production over 61 per cent, and one of her leading authorities, Prof. Wohltman, predicts that within the next 20 years there will be an additional increase of 40 per cent. The Germans say that this increase has been brought about by a better knowledge of how to till the soil and how to use fertilizers. When American farmers take up the same methods with the same thoroughness, and not until then, will our yields be raised to the same high levels.

There is a great difference in the yield of the staple crops produced in Germany, where fertilizers have been used for the last 100 years, compared with the same crops grown in the five Northeastern States of this country, where fertilizers have been used for a period of at least a half century, and compared with the same crops grown in the five Central States, where fertilizers are just beginning to be accorded their logical place in good farming, as shown by the following table:

Average yield per acre for 1910–1912, inclusive.

[United States Census Report for 1910.]

	Wheat.	Oats.	Potatoes.
	Bushels.	Bushels.	Bushels.
Germany (fertilizers used over 100 years)	31.3	51.0	186.3
5 Northeastern States—Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, New York (fertilizers used for the last half century or more)	23.9	36.6	134.5
5 Central States—Illinois, Iowa, Ohio, Indiana, Missouri (States that have used fertilizers less than 25 years)	14.5	34.4	79.5

The official German crop returns, issued by the German imperial statistical office, report that in 1912 there was an increase of 38 per cent in the crop production of that country over the production of 1911. It is interesting to note that in 1910 Germany used 6,000,000 tons of fertilizer, while in 1900 she was using only half that quantity. In 1912 American farmers, upon four times the area of land cultivated, used only 6,500,000 tons of fertilizers. To be more exact, Germany applied 145 pounds of fertilizer per cultivated acre, while the Eastern States applied 67 pounds per cultivated acre, and the Middle West corn belt States applied only 8 pounds per cultivated acre. Undoubtedly the addition of plant food in this shape is responsible to a very large degree for the larger yields of superior quality obtained across the sea.

The average value of the crops produced per acre has a direct relation to the amount of fertilizer used, according to the census reports for 1910. This is illustrated in the following table:

States.	Fertilizer used per cultivated acre.	Crop values per cultivated acre.
Indiana	$0.51	$17.08
Ohio	.93	21.58
Pennsylvania	1.28	22.96
Alabama	1.71	23.65
Georgia	2.72	28.50
Virginia	3.91	28.83
North Carolina	4.06	31.52
South Carolina	4.45	33.32
Maine	11.16	49.70

Georgia consumes the largest quantity of fertilizer of any State in this country. The census reports for 1910 show that the counties which use the largest amount of fertilizer per cultivated acre of crops produce the largest crop values per acre. This is shown by the following table:

Average value of fertilizer applied per acre cultivated.	Number of counties using fertilizer at rate shown.	Average value of all crops grown per acre cultivated.
Less than $0.50	14	$11.31
$0.50 to $1	24	15.54
$1 to $1.50	57	17.54
$1.50 to $2	39	20.70
$2 to $2.50	11	24.68
Over $2.50 ($2.98)	1	30.81

STATEMENTS BY LEADING AUTHORITIES.

"There is no style of farming that we can hope to carry on indefinitely without the use of some kind of fertilizer. Any type of farming or gardening where the entire product of the soil is sold off the farm demands a liberal use of commercial fertilizer." (Alfred Vivian, dean of the Agricultural College, Ohio State University.)

"The fertility of the soil, therefore, is simply its feeding ability. The difference between a poor soil in this respect and a rich one is that which is found between the larder of poverty and the larder of wealth. To supplement any deficiencies in plant foods, manures and fertilizers are to be freely used." (Harvey Wiley, M. D., formerly Chief Chemist of the United States Department of Agriculture, in his book, "Lure of the Land.")

"The practice of supplementing manures with commercial fertilizers, except where the former, as in some types of market gardening, are supplied in enormous quantities, has been for many years and is now practically universal." (Director William P. Brooks, Massachusetts Agricultural Experiment Station.)

"One of the principal causes of failure to secure satisfactory yields of wheat in Indiana at the present time is lack of proper attention to the matter of feeding or fertilizing the crop. There is no doubt that our farmers will have to pay more attention to this point if they wish to grow wheat at a profit. It is just as necessary to have an adequate supply of food available for a crop of wheat as it is to have plenty of food at hand in order to grow a drove of hogs." (Director Arthur Goss, Indiana Experiment Station.)

"All the States along the Atlantic seaboard now use commercial fertilizers. Eventually there will not be an acre in the Nation that can not profitably use fertilizers. If used in the smallest European proportions of $6 per acre, the aggregate sum bulks so large as to stagger the imagination." (Myron T. Herrick, former governor of Ohio, minister to France.)

"I believe that the principal increase of the harvest is to be attributed in part to the application of artificial fertilizers themselves and in part to their combination with green manures. Through the application of the two the yield on the average has been doubled on our common light soils. In some cases the yield has been increased two and one-half to three times." (Von Seelhorst, Royal Agricultural Experiment Station, Gottingen, Germany.)

"The great factor has been the introduction of fertilizers and purchased feeding stuffs. As soon as you can introduce on a farm some extraneous source of fertility, you can raise the standard of production." (Director A. D. Hall, Rothamsted Experimental Station, Harpenden, England.)

"In attempting to feed the soil, we lose sight of the immense area of an acre. An acre contains 160 square rods, or 43,560 square feet. To apply 400 pounds of fertilizer to an acre is to apply 2½ pounds to the square rod, almost a ridiculous amount. To apply 1,000 pounds per acre is to apply a little more than 6 pounds to the rod—little enough, is it not? In Europe men know better than we, and there applications of 1,000 pounds per acre of basic slag or bone meal or acid phosphate would be given even to pasture lands. Had we not better farm fewer acres and feed them well?" (Joseph Wing in the Breeders' Gazette, Oct. 9, 1912.)

The following article by Dr. Hugo Schweitzer appeared in the Review of Reviews, August, 1915:

"With cheap power Germany has been able to produce new nitrogen compounds which threaten to revolutionize our present system of fertilization."

Dr. Thomas H. Norton has said:

"As the population increases and suitable land for agricultural purposes is no longer available, the necessity of a liberal use of nitrogenous fertilizers will soon be imperative throughout all sections of the United States."

IMPORTANCE OF NITROGENOUS FERTILIZERS.

The three chief elements of plant nutrition are nitrogen, phosphorus, and potash. Nitrogen is the most important and costly element of fertility. As a fertilizer nitrogen produces more immediate and direct effects than application of phosphoric acid and potash alone. The nitrogen in many fertilizer mixtures costs more than the phosphoric acid and potash together, but it produces the greatest crop increase, especially in complete mixtures. This is illustrated by the following average yields obtained in tests covering 55 years at the Rothamsted (England) Experiment Station.

	Wheat.	Straw.
	Bushels.	Pounds.
No fertilizer	12.9	1,175
Phosphate and potash only	14.8	1,380
Nitrogen only	20.5	2,090
Complete fertilizer	31.6	3,570

It is the forms of nitrogen that account for the varying results obtained with different brands of fertilizers of the same analysis. Phosphoric acid and potash salts are alike in grade, but there are about 20 different forms of nitrogen in common use. Some are excellent, some are fairly good, and some are almost worthless.

Prof. Dr. Lemmerman, in his recommendations to the German Government at the outbreak of the war to take immediate steps for the erection of Government nitrogen factories, said:

"We are short 880,000 tons of nitrogen salts, compared with the usual consumption. If one calculates this quantity to its grain equivalent, the resulting crop shortage will amount to 3,300,000 tons of grain."

AVAILABLE SOURCES OF FIXED NITROGEN.

Nitrate of soda: The deposits of nitrate in Chile are rapidly decreasing, and it is estimated that the exhaustion of the rich and more cheaply worked deposits is only a matter of a comparatively few years. Export taxes on shipments of nitrates are the only source of revenue to the Chilean Government. These taxes and high ocean freight rates, as well as increased mining costs, account for the high prices at which nitrate has been selling in recent years.

Sulphate of ammonia: The production of sulphate of ammonia as a by-product of the distillation and coking of coal for its successful existence must have a full and adequate return on every one of the other by-products. The production of ammonia for the year 1912, as published by the American Coal Products Co. and accepted by the Government in its bulletins, was the equivalent of 165,000 tons of sulphate of ammonia. It has not been possible to learn what part of this equivalent production was actually in the form of sulphate of ammonia suitable for use as a fertilizer.

On the basis of the census returns for 1909 it is estimated that only about 40,000 tons of sulphate of ammonia were made as such for agricultural purposes. After all the discussion and the great importance that by-product ammonia has assumed in the public mind, in its relation to agriculture, an investigation has shown that the by-product coke oven is applicable to no greater production percentage of the coke demand than is represented by the maximum iron production, and that only half of this demand is practicable of being economically filled from the by-product ovens. This, then, seems to be the main limitation to the growth of the by-product oven, which produces, for the most part, the ammonia that is acidulated for fertilizer purposes. There seems also to be a natural limitation to the growth of the by-product oven of not more than one-third of the total metallurgical coke production, which would be equivalent to the coking of about 20,000,000 tons of coal per annum. This, under the present methods of operation, would be sufficient to produce the equivalent of only 200,000 tons of sulphate of ammonia per annum, of which only about 75,000 tons would be available for agricultural uses. The other 125,000 tons would find a ready demand at profitable prices in the form of aqua and anhydrous ammonia. Therefore it may well be considered that the actual commercial limit of sulphate of ammonia production from by-product ovens for agriculture will not exceed 100,000 tons per year.

Organic ammoniates: We have now reached the limit of fertilizer ammoniates derived from the animal and vegetable matter, such as bone, meat tankages, seed meals, etc. Practically all of these materials are being utilized to an increasing extent each year for stock-feeding purposes because of their greater value in that direction. The production of these materials is large and important, but far from sufficient to meet the demands of agriculture and quite prohibitive in cost for general fertilizer use.

Atmospheric nitrogen: The fixation of atmospheric nitrogen may be expected to give the world its nitrogen supply at one-half the price that it would otherwise amount to. It is a wonderful providence that perpetual and inexhaustible supplies of nitrogen may be obtained from the atmosphere by the use of hydroelectric power. Hydroelectric nitrogen plants have long been in operation in Norway, Sweden, Germany, Australia, Switzerland, Italy, France, Spain, and Canada, but there are none in the United States. The industry has been in commercial operation for approximately 10 years. It has long emerged from the experimental period, and as early as 1913 was represented by an investment of approximately $60,000,000. The annual value of the product is upward of $30,000,000.

The total quantity of nitrogen fixed by existing processes prior to the war is divided in the ratio of about two-thirds to cyanamide and one-third to the arc processes. The annual productive capacity of the existing plants employing the arc and cyanamide processes was between 90,000 and 100,000 net tons of fixed nitrogen at the beginning of the European war. The German production, by the cyanamide process, according to latest reports, has been raised from 60,000 tons of cyanamide in August, 1914, to 600,000 tons at the present time.

The cyanamide process: The cyanamide process for the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen as operated in Europe and Canada can be established in the United States if a plentiful supply of water power is made available. Of all the processes of obtaining nitrogen compounds none is as cheap or unlimited in the amount that can be produced as the cyanamide process. The greatest heat and the greatest cold obtainable are utilized in making cyanamide. By the intense heat of the electric furnace (6,000° F.) lime and coke are fused together to make calcium carbide. This is powdered and placed in large drumlike ovens and then brought by electricity to a white heat. In the meantime wonderful machines are making liquid air by compressing and cooling over and over again clear, pure air until at 380° below zero the air liquefies. Air is four-fifths nitrogen and one-fifth oxygen. When the liquid air is warmed a little only pure nitrogen gas is given off. This is pumped into the drum-shaped ovens containing the white-hot carbide, by which it is absorbed and by which it is permanently fixed. The product, cyanamide, when cooled, ground, and processed with special machinery, is suitable for use as a fertilizer.

Cyanamide is a bluish-black, odorless, powdered material. It contains from 20 to 22 per cent atmospheric nitrogen. The factories located at Niagara Falls Canada, have been increased from an original capacity in 1909 of 12,000 tons to 64,000 tons cyanamide per annum in 1914, and at which rate they are now operating. The product is used by over 300 fertilizer manufacturers in the United States, and it is estimated that cyanamide is now used as a source of organic nitrogen in about one-quarter of the total ammoniated fertilizer mixtures consumed in the United States.

AMMONIUM PHOSPHATE.

It is quite easy to obtain ammonia gas from cyanamide by treatment with superheated steam. This ammonia can be fixed in phosphoric acid to make a patented chemical fertilizer known as "ammo-phos," which is principally phosphate of ammonia. The phosphoric acid used in the process is obtained from phosphate rock by extraction with sulphuric acid or by electric-furnace treatment. The ammo-phos resulting from the combination of ammonia and phosphoric acid is a dry gray or cream-colored powdered material that looks very much like ordinary acid phosphate. Ammo-phos contains about 12 per cent ammonia and 48 per cent available phosphoric acid. The ammonia (nitrogen) content can be increased to 20 per cent, and the phosphoric acid reduced to give any desired ratio of ammonia (nitrogen) to phosphoric acid. Both constituents are almost entirely water soluble. The product is perfectly neutral, pleasant to handle, and will keep indefinitely. Ammo-phos is the result of years of research to develop an ideal or universal fertilizing material from atmospheric nitrogen fixed by the cyanamide process. It can be mixed in any desired quantity with potash salts. A mixture of ammo-phos and potash salts would equal in all respects the so-called and recently exploited "universal fertilizer" with which Germany threatens to revolutionize her agriculture.

IMPORTANCE OF NITROGEN AND PHOSPHORIC ACID.

One hundred and seventy-seven millions dollars was expended for commercial fertilizers in the United States during the year 1914. Of this amount $78,000,000 was paid for nitrogen and $65,000,000 for phosphoric acid, a total of $134,000,000 for both, or over 80 per cent of the entire bill. Only $43,000,000 was paid for potash. Germany is smaller than the State of Texas, yet she uses more fertilizer than the entire United States—about $200,000,000. Her crop yields are approximately 80 per cent greater than the yields of this country. If the United States had available an adequate cheap supply of fertilizer, and used it at the German rate per cultivated acre, and secured thereby the same increase in production credited to the use of fertilizers in Germany, there would be a net gain in crop yields to the United States, over and above the cost of the fertilizer, of $1,000,000,000 per year.

MERITS OF AMMO-PHOS.

Ammo-phos has been tested on 23 different farm crops in all parts of the United States. These tests have demonstrated that it is equal or superior to ordinary fertilizers that furnish the same amount of plant food constituents. The material contains more than 60 per cent of plant foods, and is therefore three to five times as rich in fertilizing value as ordinary fertilizer mixtures, which usually contain only 12 to 20 per cent plant foods. Hence only one-third to one-fifth as much ammo-phos need be applied in the form of mixed fertilizers.

The highly concentrated form of ammo-phos can be expected to greatly reduce the present-day expense of hauling, freighting, mixing, bagging, handling, and applying fertilizers. There are no material limitations to the amount of ammo-phos that can be produced.

Pure ammonium phosphate can be made in large quantities as a by-product of the manufactured ammo-phos. The principal industrial use of pure ammonium phosphate is for fireproofing textiles and other inflammable materials and in the manufacture of baking powders, etc.

REQUISITES FOR THE MANUFACTURE OF AMMO-PHOS.

(1) A plentiful supply of cheap water power.
(2) Large quantities of phosphate rock—which can be readily obtained from the deposits in Florida, Tennessee, and Western States.

NATIONAL AND ECONOMIC CONSIDERATIONS.

Ammo-phos on the unit of plant-food basis, and if made in sufficient quantities, would effect a saving in the cost of the United States fertilizer bill of more than 50 per cent on the nitrogen and 20 per cent on the phosphoric acid. If it were made in sufficient quantities to furnish United States farmers all the nitrogen and phosphoric acid necessary to fertilize their cultivated acreage, at the same rate that the Germans fertilize, then our total expenditures for fertilizers would be only $580,000,000 instead of $740,000,000, which would be the cost for the grades now obtainable. Based on the best figures obtainable, this expenditure for fertlizer should raise the total value of all farm crops from $5,487,000,000, census 1910, to $7,130,000,000, leaving a net gain, after deducting the cost of fertilizer, of $1,240,000,000. This great figure of gain is worthy of the most serious consideration in connection with this country's problems on the cost of living, readjustments of land values, conservation, and means of providing adequate national defense.

The plants and equipment for making ammo-phos would be available, in time of war, for furnishing great quantities of nitric acid and sulphuric acid. The various kinds of gunpowder, explosives, and primers used in cartridges, grenades, shrapnel, bombs, torpedoes, and the like require for their production large amounts of both the acids named. In this respect the establishment of one or more ammo-phos factories would be an excellent preparedness measure.

Ammo-phos factories can be advantageously located near the large beds of phosphate rock in the United States, and thus assist in the development of this very important resource.

In times of peace, explosives in the war sense are substantially unknown and without use. In their manufacture, as well as in fertilizer, nitrogen is uniformly required as the chief constituent. The only nitrogen material at present available for use on a large scale is Chilean nitrate of soda. Germany began the war with a store of $30,000,000 worth of Chilean nitrate imported mainly for fertilizer purposes. But even this great store was adequate only for a short period, and realizing the impracticability of protecting the long sea route from Chile, Germany turned her attention to increasing the existing plants and equipment within her borders for the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen and its conversion into explosives. Her present use of explosives is estimated by military experts to be a quantity which at the present contract prices for similar explosives furnished in the United States represents approximately an expenditure of $1,000,000 per day. This represents a daily consumption of about one and one-third million pounds of powder, requiring upward of 500,000 pounds of nitrogen.

It was only by applying to her military necessities the inventions of her scientists that Germany has been able to continue the contest and preserve, as her people believe, her national integrity.

The United States Government now has absolutely no means of amplifying its nitrogen supply except as long as it can keep open and unmolested the sea route from Chile to United States ports.

The statement has been attributed to the Secretary of War that "The United States has a store of explosives sufficient only to enable her to conduct a war from 8 o'clock until half-past 10 of the same morning."

Cheap nitrogen is the basis for making and supplying an abundance of fertilizers and explosives. To obtain it in sufficient quantities is a question of the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen. Therefore, the most pressing of all economic questions, that of increasing the country's crop yields and the greatest problem in conducting a war, find a solution in the most wonderful of all modern discoveries—the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, here is the last analysis of this question. What do fertilizers cost the German people? What do they cost our people? Germany has 70 per cent of the number of our population. The size of her territory is not any greater than that of Texas—Texas compared to the United States—and yet per cultivated acre, Germany uses seven times as much fertilizer as is used by the farmers in the United States per average acre cultivated, and Germany in that small territory produces 95 per cent of the food products necessary to feed her people.

What does the story mean? It means cheap fertilizer. In the United States nitrogen costs our people—it is the census authority that I am giving—$4.65 per unit; phosphoric acid costs 90 cents per unit, and potash costs $1.36 per unit. In Germany nitrogen costs $2.45 per unit; phosphoric acid costs 60 cents per unit, and potash costs 31 cents per unit. The difference in the nitrogen cost alone is $2.20 per unit to enable that great people, with a population 70 per cent of ours, within a territory no larger than Texas, to practically be self-sustaining and to feed their own people in their own country; and yet we are told that this question has no place in a Government bill; that the Government of the United States has no right to act on this question, but that you must leave the question of making nitrates for powder in times of war and fertilizer in times of peace for the exploitation of a private corporation that was so good as to come here this morning in advance of my speech and to tell the Senate of the United States that they have the money to develop our water powers and to take care of our nitrogen problem for us, and that the people of the United States are not concerned about it!

Mr. President, I am not concerned about the language of the amendment I have offered. I think it is a fair one, because it seeks only to get the necessary information that Congress may in the future legislate upon; but I am willing to accept any fair amendment which the Committee on Military Affairs proposes or which the Senate may prefer to mine. I do say, however, Mr. President, that if the Senate of the United States seeks to pass a bill entitled a preparedness bill to protect this country against a foreign enemy in time of war and leaves out of it all provision looking to a suitable supply of nitric acid for the United States Government, the bill will be a travesty on legislation, a disgrace to the American people, and unworthy of the Congress of the United States. I do not believe that the efforts that were made in the House of Representatives to defeat this legislation can be successful in the Senate of the United States; and with that I leave the case with you.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I think it but proper that I should now state, at the close of the speech of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], for the information of the Senate, that a bill embodying the ideas set forth by him has been introduced in the Senate and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. We have had quite a series of hearings on this particular point. We availed ourselves of the experts of the Government; we also availed ourselves of experts who had an interest in the manufacture of nitrates. The committee, after those voluminous hearings, the report of which is printed and is now available for the use of the Senate, considered the terms of the bill, and with very slight amendments they reported favorably on it.

The committee believed that the information we now have warranted us in reporting a bill that sought to put the Government in a position to go immediately into the preparation for locating the water-power sites, erecting the plants, and securing what in its judgment are the best places for the extraction of nitrates.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. May I ask the Senator from South Carolina a question?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. It has been stated to me that there are only two water-power sites in the United States that will furnish power enough to accomplish the result which the Senator from South Carolina is so ably advocating. Can the Senator tell me as to that, and where those sites are located?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire that the question which he has propounded was in some form or other asked practically by every member of the committee who was interested in this subject, and the hearings will develop the fact that there are numerous water-power sites in this country where water power can be developed amply sufficient to manufacture this commodity.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is what I supposed. It seemed to me inconceivable that there could be in the United States only two places where this could be done, and I am glad to get the Senator's opinion on that point.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will take the pains to read the report of the hearings. There were one or two witnesses who testified as to that point, and the fact is, it was stated by one witness that he believed there were but two water-power sites sufficient for this purpose, as the Senator from New Hampshire has intimated he has been told.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Where were they located?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. One of them was, I believe, on the Columbia River; and the other one, I believe, was on the Alabama River, perhaps at Muscle Shoals.

Mr. GALLINGER. It was on the Coosa River, I think.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think it was on the Alabama River.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It was on the Tennessee River.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. On the Tennessee River.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Before the Senator from South Carolina passes from that point, I should like to state that there are at least a half dozen points in the State of Washington where a sufficient water power could be developed for the manufacture of nitrogen. There are at least three points on the Columbia River where the entire volume of that river could be used.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, could the Senator from Washington give us the approximate water power which could be developed at the different sites to which he refers in the State of Washington?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I could very readily furnish the names of such sites to the Senator, but I am not able at this time to give the horsepower which could be produced at each one of the different sites. There is also a water-power site, which has been referred to in a number of these hearings, on the Pend Oreille River, which is sometimes called the Clarke Fork of the Columbia.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I should like to call the Senator's attention to the fact that one thing that seemed to restrict the consideration of some of the more desirable of the water powers was the attitude of the committee that in establishing these plants we should get sufficiently far from the seacoast so that whatever plants were established by the Government might not be jeopardized by war vessels or by the rapid approach from the coast to them. This much, however, was developed, that we had ample water power throughout the United States; in fact, that we had water power in the southeastern part of our country, in the western part of our country, and in the northeastern part of our country for the purpose of producing this chemical.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. JONES. I wish to ask the Senator from South Carolina what the testimony shows would be the necessary power to be developed at a given point for the purpose of manufacturing nitrate?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. All of those who testified before the committee said that the minimum that would be the most economical was 30,000 horsepower.

Mr. JONES. I simply desire to reiterate what my colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] has stated, that we have at least a half dozen places like that away in the interior of the State of Washington. We have one such development of 400,000 horsepower, one of 112,000 horsepower, that I know of, and another of 100,000 horsepower.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think there is no difficulty about that. I do not think there is any question as to our obtaining water-power sites.

Mr. POINDEXTER. We already have in the neighborhood of 190,000 horsepower developed at the city of Spokane.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I want to reiterate a statement I made a moment ago, which perhaps Senators interested did not hear or appreciate. The committee was informed by the officers of the department that, in their judgment, it would be unwise to attempt to locate a Government plant for the manufacture of this article within a certain distance of the coast, and it so happened that on the extreme western coast the more desirable power sites were beyond that limit, but that did not in anyway seem to subtract from the available power of this country so as to make it difficult for us to enter upon this enterprise.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I am very glad I asked the question I did, because if it has developed the fact that 30,000 horsepower is sufficient for this purpose, I will look up some sites in New England and submit them to the Senate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if the Senator from South Carolina will allow me, I think there may be some confusion about the amount of horsepower. Of course, there are two different kinds of horsepower—primary horsepower and secondary horsepower. It is not difficult to find a high secondary horsepower, but a plant of this kind to be used by the Government every day in the year, and especially in time of war, would have to be established where the power was primary, and there are not so very many places where there is found primary power, which means, considering times when the flow of water is low, a steady power running every day in the year.

Mr. GALLINGER. Precisely; and if the Senator from South Carolina will permit me just one word, if the Government is going into this enterprise, the Government must establish a plant that will produce a sufficient quantity of the commodity for its needs. I apprehend we could produce a little on 30,000 horsepower, but it would not amount to much.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire to the fact that before introducing my bill I furnished to the department the data and had them incorporate in proper language the very object that I had in view. In making inquiry of them they were of opinion that it would not be wise, from an economical standpoint or from a strategical standpoint, to have merely one or two plants, but they thought that such plants should be located throughout the country where they would serve the best purposes both in time of peace and in time of war. For instance, it was indicated to us by one of the chief chemists—one of the chief scientists of this country—that the northeastern or the eastern part of our country, where a great volume of nitric acid is used in manufacturing processes and also where great munition factories happen to be located, would be one of the logical points to place one of these factories. Then, from the standpoint both of preparedness for war purposes and for agriculture, one should be located in the southeastern part of the country, and one in the western part for that developing section. You will find in the testimony that they covered this ground very exhaustively.

I wish now to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that one reason why we are so insistent that the question of fertilizers shall be considered in this connection is because it so happens that the very chemicals which are essential in the manufacture of modern explosives are the exact chemicals which are used in fertilizing the soil. It would seem absurd for us, in a democratic Government, to commit ourselves to the Government manufacturing its munitions of war, enlarging the required plants beyond the yield ordinarily necessary in order to provide for the exigencies of war, and then, from the very nature of the case, having produced surplus quantities of the very articles which the farmer needs, be estopped from furnishing him that which all of us are dependent upon. Mr. President, I take it that the army that stands in front of the musket and the cannon is only accidental, and the necessity for its activities is always to be deplored, and certainly we should not overlook the needs of that vast army which for 12 months in the year, with the armament of the hoe and the plow, have to fight every day in order that we may stay here and in order that we may have a Government at all. Underneath all lies the essential fundamental principle of a fertile soil to feed a progressive people. I take it, therefore, that the first consideration of this body should not be cannon, should not be the Navy, should not be munitions of war, but first and primarily our first object should be to provide for the commissary department, so that we may be independent of all other nations in this regard.

We investigated this question, and when I shall take the floor—which I propose to do before the bill now under consideration shall have been passed—I shall take occasion to call the attention of the Senate to the bill which the Agriculture Committee has reported without any other object in view than to provide for the very exigency that is now upon us. The bill reported by that committee provides what we believe is a practical beginning of the solution of this question. We believe that we have sufficient data in the hearings to warrant us in appropriating $15,000,000, and as it is a permanent improvement, in providing for a bond issue, under acts already upon the statute books, for the liquidation of the indebtedness incurred. It is a permanent improvement that future generations will enjoy as much or more than we, and therefore we have provided for the liquidation of it.

We have also provided, by section 7, that the Government alone shall, without any association or any partnership with private corporations, do this work. We have ascertained as nearly as may be the amount of money necessary adequately to furnish these supplies.

The question may be asked what process do we propose to use? I think there is full scope in the bill for those who are charged with its execution and administration to select the one best adapted to the peculiar circumstances which exist in this country.

Now, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that in the Southeastern States—what are known popularly as the "cotton States"—statistics can be furnished to show what the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], in part, showed, that practically 50 per cent of the gross proceeds of the entire cotton crop in most of the Southern States goes to settle the guano account. I do not believe there is a Senator here who will be unwillingly, with this opportunity presenting itself now, in view of the fact that this is a new process not yet preempted by private capital and that the water power is in our hands, to have the Government enter at this time upon the work of preparing these commodities which will protect us in time of war and which will also help feed us in time of peace.

Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama has proposed an amendment providing for the appointment of a commission. To what source would that commission go to get its information? It would go to the identical source which we have already practically exhausted. In the meantime legislation is being passed that may cause others to preempt the water-power field. Legislation may be passed in the meantime that will obstruct the very object of this bill. So after due consideration we have provided what, in the opinion of experts, is a sufficient appropriation; we have provided for the means of obtaining that appropriation and have provided that the Government shall take over and designate the power sites and immediately enter upon the construction of the necessary plants by such process as, in their judgment, is best and most available. So that in the consideration of any scheme of preparedness the bill which the Agricultural Committee has submitted to this body, in my judgment, is a wise and proper thing for us to address ourselves to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I desire to ask unanimous consent of the Senate to have the House bill and the Senate bill printed in parallel columns for the use of the Senate. Probably 250 copies will be sufficient.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

The order was reduced to writing and agreed to (S. Doc. No. 379), as follows:

Ordered, That there be printed as a Senate document, in parallel columns, a comparative print of the bill (H. R. 12766) "to increase the efficiency of the Military Establishment of the United States," showing the bill as passed by the House, and the bill (S. 4840) "for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," as reported to the Senate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, in reference to the investigation of the subject, which was so ably discussed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], I desire to say to the Senate that it was not considered at any length by the Military Affairs Committee. We understood—and I particularly understood—that the matter was being investigated fully by the Agricultural Committee, that hearings were being had, and that that committee intended to report a bill which would cover the whole subject. As my colleague on the committee, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] has said, there were no members of our committee who were acquainted with the subject at all; and inasmuch as it was being investigated by another committee, and the Military Affairs Committee thought that that committee would report out a bill about the time that the preparedness bill came up for consideration, we understood the committee would submit a report which would enable the Senate to vote intelligently upon the whole subject, and the Committee on Military Affairs did not deem it advisable to consider the question at length.

I will also say for the committee that after Senate bill 4840, the military bill, had been reported and after the House had voted down a provision in the House bill bearing upon this subject, the distinguished Senator from Alabama submitted to me, as chairman of the committee, the resolution which he has now offered as an amendment; and I promised him then that during the consideration of the pending bill we would be very glad to have him appear before the committee and make a statement. That promise has not been redeemed, but will be; so that the committee is entirely free to act upon it in any way it may see fit; and the committee will be glad to hear from the Senator on this very subject, and his amendment may be considered either as a committee amendment or otherwise and action taken upon it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. May I say to the Senator from Oregon that it has been suggested to members of the Agricultural Committee that the bill reported by that committee, which is very short and, I think, very comprehensive, be offered as an amendment to the pending bill——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. At the proper time.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. At the proper time; and that course may be adopted. Of course it depends upon some contingencies, which perhaps may or may not arise; but I thought it only fair that I should notify the Senator now of that fact. I believe I discussed it somewhat with him previously.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I did not introduce my amendment until after the amendment to the House bill had been defeated, for the obvious reason that it would not have been necessary if the amendment had been carried in the House. I did ask the Senator from Oregon for a hearing, and he promised me that during the consideration of this bill I would have an opportunity to be heard. I have presented the case as I understand it before the Senate, and I should like to take advantage of the opportunity offered by him at such time as he finds it convenient for his committee to meet and have me appear before it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The committee will be glad to have the Senator come in, as I told the Senator a day or two ago.

Now, I desire to submit a few committee amendments to the bill. They are very short, and I think they can be easily disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendments.

The SECRETARY. The first amendment is, on page 106, in line 13, at the end of the line, after the word "for" and before the period, to insert the following:

Provided, That the total enlisted force of the line of the Regular Army, including the Philippine Scouts, but excluding the enlisted men of the Quartermaster Corps, of the Medical Corps, and the unassigned recruits, shall not at any one time, except in the event of actual or threatened war or similar emergency in which the public safety demands it, exceed 180,000.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The purpose of that amendment is to fix the maximum strength of the Army in time of peace.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi will state it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Oregon, whether, after the Senate shall finish the consideration of the Senate bill, it will then be offered as a substitute for the House bill? What I desire to know is will the Senate be given an opportunity to choose between the Senate bill after it shall be perfected and offered as the committee substitute and the House bill as it came from the House?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; I hoped that might be done.

Mr. SMOOT. It will have to be done.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That, I understand, is the attitude? The Senator is now offering amendments to the committee substitute?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Then the question will recur on the adoption of the committee substitute for the House bill?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. After the amendments have been determined upon.

Mr. VARDAMAN. After the amendments are adopted to the committee bill?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon give me the benefit of his advice on what might turn out to be a parliamentary point at a later time? As I understand the amendment which has just been offered in behalf of the committee, the Regular Army of the United States, exclusive of those branches of the service specifically mentioned in the amendment, shall not at any time, except in case of war, exceed the number of 180,000.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It has been my intention, at a later time during the consideration of this bill, to offer amendments affecting the peace strength of the Cavalry and Field Artillery branches, the effect of which would be to increase them over the terms proposed in the bill; and that, of course, would conflict with the amendment which has now been proposed by the committee, if the amendment which I shall offer to the composition of the Cavalry units and the composition of the Field Artillery units should be adopted.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It would, I think, as a parliamentary proposition.

Mr. WADSWORTH. With the acceptance by the Senate of this amendment, limiting the Regular Army to 180,000——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In time of peace.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In time of peace, would my amendment be in order later on?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator would have to appeal to the Chair on that question.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It would not be if the total would increase the force beyond 180,000. If we adopt an amendment limiting the force to 180,000, I take it for granted that no subsequent amendment could increase the number unless we reconsidered the action upon this amendment.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President, I wish to state that I have never heard of this amendment before.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, this is a very serious matter. If the acceptance of this amendment is going to tie the hands of the Senate with respect to the increase of the Regular Army over the figures fixed in this bill as at present before the Senate, it will become a very grave question whether any branch of the Army may be increased by the Senate's own vote as the result of an amendment being offered upon the floor during the debate.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the opinion of the Chair, this is not a parliamentary question at all. If the amendment should be adopted now, limiting the maximum strength of the peace footing of the Regular Army to 180,000, and subsequently additional amendments should be adopted by the Senate increasing various branches of the service, it would simply be a question for the War Department to determine what on earth it was going to do with the bill. It is not a parliamentary question at all.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee if this is a committee amendment? I never heard of it before.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say to the Senator that it was not adopted in the full committee.

Mr. DU PONT. I never heard of it before.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It was discussed by members of the committee.

Mr. DU PONT. Does the chairman think this is the appropriate moment to bring it forward, before the bill is discussed?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the Senator objects, I will refer it back to the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I suggest that the chairman of the committee let this amendment go over for the present.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am perfectly willing to let it go over.

Mr. OVERMAN. The committee substitute ought to be perfected before we vote on it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will not the chairman of the committee let us know what they are, at any rate, now?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have sent them up to the desk, and I shall be glad to have the Secretary read them all.

The SECRETARY. On page 124, in line 13, after the letter "a," it is proposed to strike out the words "further detail" and insert "reappointment," so that, if amended, it will read:

Provided, That no officer shall be eligible to a reappointment as chief of an arm, corps, department, or bureau until he has served two years with the branch of the Army in which commissioned.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 133, line 12, after the word "seventy-five," at the end of the line, it is proposed to insert:

Provided further, That so much of the act approved January 25, 1907, as provides that the Chief of Coast Artillery shall be a member of the General Staff Corps is hereby repealed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask the Senator to allow that to go over, as I have an amendment to offer on the paragraph just above, where the Senator asks that this amendment be put in.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have no objection to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over.

The SECRETARY. On page 142, in line 20, after the word "Engineers," the second word in the line, and after the comma, it is proposed to insert:

Supply sergeant, mess sergeant, and stable sergeant, Corps of Engineers.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There are a number of amendments. All of the next two or three amendments are practically to the same effect, and are to restore these men to the same pay they are receiving under the law as it is now.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 142, lines 20 and 21, it is proposed to strike out "and Cavalry, Artillery, and Corps of Engineers" and insert "Cavalry and Artillery."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 142, line 22, it is proposed to strike out the comma after the word "Cavalry," and insert the word "and."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. In the same line, on the same page, after the word "Artillery," it is proposed to strike out the comma and the words "and Corps of Engineers."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 142, line 25, it is proposed to strike out the comma after the word "Infantry" and insert the word "and," so that it will read "Infantry and Cavalry"; and in the same line, on the same page, after the word "Cavalry," it is proposed to strike out the comma and the words "and Corps of Engineers."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 161, line 2, after the word "only," the last word in the line, it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That without the consent of Congress such Volunteer force shall not be called out for field service for more than a total period exceeding 30 days in any one year.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say, with reference to that amendment, that the question was raised here yesterday as to whether or not the President could call out the Volunteer Army in full force in time of peace without any limitation, for a year if he saw fit to do so. This is to limit the power of the President over the Volunteer Army, except during the time covered by these training periods of 30 days in a year.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, there will be an amendment offered proposing to strike out the entire section; and I am not enough of a parliamentarian to know whether the adoption of this amendment will affect such an amendment or not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That will not affect it. If there is to be a motion to strike out the entire section, the adoption of the amendment will not affect the motion to strike it out.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, what section is it?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Section 56.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 161, in line 16, after the word "into," the second word in the line, it is proposed to strike out the word "two" and to insert the word "three," so that, if amended, it will read:

And shall be divided into three classes, the National Guard and the unorganized militia.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The purpose of that amendment is this: The bill as it is written seems to legislate out of existence the Naval Militia, and it might be that the law would be so construed. There was no purpose on the part of the committee to abolish the Naval Militia. This simply continues the present arrangement.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I intend to offer a substitute for section 57, but adopting this will not interfere with that.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. In the same line, on the same page, after the words "National Guard," it is proposed to insert a comma and the words "the Naval Militia."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That has the same object in view.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. Also, on page 161, line 21, after the word "equipped," it is proposed to insert "as a land force," so that, if amended, it will read:

The National Guard shall consist of the regularly enlisted militia, between the ages of 16 and 45 years, organized, armed, and equipped as a land force.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is for the same purpose—to protect the Naval Militia.

The SECRETARY. On page 161, in line 24, after the word "militia," the third word in the line, it is proposed to insert a comma and the words "except the Naval Militia."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia will state it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Are we proceeding now with general amendments or just committee amendments?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Committee amendments.

Mr. HARDWICK. Other amendments will be in order after we have finished the committee amendments?

The VICE PRESIDENT. After we have finished the committee amendments.

The SECRETARY. On page 169, line 8, after the word "Militia," it is proposed to insert a comma and the words "except the Naval Militia."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That has the same purpose. I desire to say to the Senate that there are no substantial changes. The changes that have been made are principally of form rather than of substance.

The SECRETARY. On page 174, in line 11, after the word "engineer" and the comma, it is proposed to insert "Coast Artillery."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 185, in line 9, after the word "militia," it is proposed to insert a comma and the words "except the Naval Militia."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I understand, from the amendment that went in before this, that the Naval Militia is not a part of the National Guard.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No; it is not a part of the National Guard as at present organized. There is a separate Naval Militia act, and we want to except that from this provision, so as not to abolish it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I mean when this bill goes into effect the Naval Militia will not be a part of what is known as the National Guard?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No, sir.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was not quite clear in my mind whether the Senator was correctly accomplishing what he had in mind, but I assume that he knows his business better than I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to suggest to the Senator from Oregon that the word "militia," in line 9, page 185, ought to be stricken out and the words "National Guard" inserted.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It might be done in that way.

Mr. CUMMINS. And the same in the heading of the section. I think if those things could be done, and the word "active" put in before "service," in line 10, it would express the situation much better.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I want to call the Senator's attention to section 57, which provides that—

The militia of the United States shall consist of all able-bodied male citizens of the United States and all other able-bodied males who have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States who are more than 16 years of age and not more than 45 years of age, and shall be divided into three classes.

Now, it provides for the National Guard and the unorganized militia.

Mr. CUMMINS. But, of course, the word "militia," in the two lines I have mentioned, does not refer to the unorganized militia, I assume.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Without going over the bill generally covering this subject, I do not know just what effect it might have.

Mr. CUMMINS. However, I simply desire to call it to the attention of the Senator from Oregon, because I shall offer amendments on those points when the time comes.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Delaware will state it.

Mr. DU PONT. I should like to ask whether the first amendment offered by the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, in reference to the maximum size of the Regular Army in time of peace, has been acted upon?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; that amendment has been passed over.

The SECRETARY. The committee also offers one other amendment—on page 196, the last page of the bill, in line 14, after the words "land force" and the comma, to insert, "and not to the Naval Militia, which shall consist of such part of the militia as may be prescribed by the President for each State, Territory, or District," so that, if amended, it will read:

The provisions of this act in respect to the militia shall be applicable only to the militia organized as a land force, and not to the Naval Militia, which shall consist of such part of the militia as may be prescribed by the President for each State, Territory, or District, and shall take effect on July 1, 1916.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That preserves the Naval Militia under the law as it is at present organized, Mr. President.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Those are all the amendments the committee desires to offer at this time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think he answered it yesterday, but I have forgotten the answer. Somebody inquired of the Senator what the number of the Philippine Scouts was—how large a force.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. A little over 5,000 men. I can give the Senator the exact number.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is near enough for my purpose. I noticed that the amendment which the Senator proposed this afternoon, and which has been passed over temporarily, provided that the total number of men provided for under this bill in times of peace should not exceed 180,000, including the Philippine Scouts.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They have always been counted as a part of the enlisted strength of the line of the Army.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; I assume that is true. I wanted to ask the Senator this question, then: Are the Philippine Scouts, under the law which organized that body, subject to be ordered to this country to do military duty or to be sent to foreign countries?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say to the Senator that I have never taken occasion to look into that. I really do not know.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The object of my inquiry was simply this: The number of men provided for by this bill is, in my opinion, not at all excessive; and personally I should like to see the regular standing army in time of peace not less than 250,000 men. Now, the number of 5,000 men is quite a percentage of 180,000 men; and unless the law is so that the Philippine Scouts can be ordered to this country, or that a similar number of men could be added to the number authorized by this bill in case the Philippine Scouts should be disbanded by reason of our losing control of the Philippines, or otherwise, I should hope the Senator would lay that matter before the committee again, as to whether the Philippine Scouts ought to be included in determining the size of our Army.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Connecticut to the fact that while the Philippine Scouts to-day consist of 5,733 men, the law authorizes the enlistment of 10,000 men, so that they have never been recruited to the limit authorized by law. Therefore, should this limit be reached and you include them in the Regular Army, you reduce the total to a much lower figure than that at which we were given to understand it was to be fixed.

I do not approve of the amendment limiting it to 180,000 men, unless you exclude the Philippine Scouts. I will say that this amendment never has been discussed in the committee, and my attention has never been called to it, although I have been here all the time. I think it is a very important proposition.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator is correct about that. It has not been discussed behind the committee doors. It has, however, been discussed among members of the committee, as these amendments are usually considered when a bill is being acted upon by the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, in view of what the Senator from Delaware says, I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that there would seem to be some ambiguity, possibly, in the language of the amendment which he has proposed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say to the Senator that that amendment has been passed over for this evening, anyhow, and we can discuss that point later.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I know it has been passed over; but I was simply going to suggest to the mind of the Senator now, as being a convenient time, whether the language that he has used, "including the Philippine Scouts," would include the Philippine Scouts as they are now organized, under the present number existing, or whether it would include the whole 10,000 authorized.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is true that if the President authorized the enlistment of natives of the Philippine Islands to the total number fixed by law, 12,000, it would reduce the total strength of other forces included in the 180,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator what is the maximum limit fixed in the bill? In the amendment it is fixed at 180,000. The maximum fixed in the bill is 240,000, I believe.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Two hundred and fifty thousand.

Mr. OVERMAN. Suppose the amendment is adopted fixing it at 180,000, what will be the total amount of money to be appropriated by this Congress to meet that increase?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I gave that information to the Senator yesterday, based on an estimate of the minimum strength.

Mr. OVERMAN. I thought it was the maximum—240,000.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator is speaking of the House provision, which provides for 140,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is the House provision; yes; I want to know how much money we will have to appropriate now, if the maximum is 180,000, including everything—not only the pay of the officers, but the equipment of the officers, and the guns, and everything we will have to furnish. What will be the total appropriation we will have to make in this bill if the maximum is 180,000?

Mr. WARREN. We only provide for the addition of the first increment of one-fifth in the coming immediate appropriation.

Mr. OVERMAN. The appropriation bill always appropriates for quarters and all that.

Mr. WARREN. I know it; but this increase of the Army is to come in one, two, three, four, and five years.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand that; but we will have to appropriate for the first year an additional amount.

Mr. WARREN. For the first increment only.

Mr. OVERMAN. For the first increment.

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not see any estimate of what that would cost—the clothing, the guns, the machine guns, and all that. It is not included in this. We have got to appropriate for all of this if we increase the Army to 180,000; and I should like to know just about what the total amount is that this Congress will have to appropriate, including the first increment, the men, and the equipment.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator does not mean that we are to appropriate in the coming bill for 180,000 men?

Mr. OVERMAN. We are going to provide for 180,000 men.

Mr. WARREN. I know we are, but they will only be taken into the Army four or five years from now.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is the limit, the maximum.

Mr. WARREN. Some will come in within one year.

Mr. OVERMAN. What I want to know is, what it will cost this year.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will give that information to the Senator.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator probably has it there. It is approximately at the rate of $1,000 a man.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. For the first year——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I should like to state——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let me answer the Senator's question. The enlisted strength of 180,000 is divided into five increments——

Mr. WARREN. The House bill had a division of four increments.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; we have five. It will cost approximately, as shown in Table X of Senate Report 263, the first year $126,000,000; the second year, $138,000,000; the third year, $151,000,000; the fourth year, $167,000,000; the fifth year, $182,000,000; and annually thereafter about $177,000,000. That covers the Quartermaster Department, the current cost, the new equipment, and the heavy artillery in the Ordnance Department.

Mr. OVERMAN. And the pay of the enlisted men?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes. In the Engineer Department it covers the current cost and the new equipment; in the Signal Corps, current cost and new equipment; and the Medical Department.

Mr. WARREN. So it not only covers the equipment but it covers also the housing of the men.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir; practically everything.

Mr. WARREN. Every possible expense that can be contemplated or estimated beforehand is covered in the figures that the Senator has given.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator please state on what page that is?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. On page 24 of the report of the committee.

Mr. OVERMAN. The cost of the Regular Army. That includes everything?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I should like to ascertain—I am not clear in my mind yet—what would be the peace strength of the Army under the Senate bill?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The minimum strength under the Senate committee amendment is 194,586, which includes the Quartermaster Corps, the Hospital Corps, the unassigned recruits, and the Philippine Scouts.

Mr. NELSON. That would be the number of the Army after the first year.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It would be one-fifth of the proposed increase after the first year.

Mr. NELSON. The ultimate increase of the peace strength will only be reached in the fifth year?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. NELSON. What is the aggregate of the increased peace strength?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Under the proposed amendment, 180,000 men.

Mr. NELSON. And what will be the war strength when full?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Two hundred and fifty thousand.

Mr. NELSON. Instead of making the complete war strength in one year, it takes five years?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Not the war strength; the peace strength.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. So at the end of the first year in time of peace there will be added to the present strength of the Army only 16,000?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is all.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Sixteen thousand in time of peace, until at the end of five years the maximum in time of peace can not exceed 180,000?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If that amendment goes through.

Mr. DU PONT. I hope the Senator will change it is as to make it exclusive instead of inclusive of the Philippine Scouts.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The amendment has been passed over.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator said the increase is only 16,000 the first year. Is that in addition to the increase of 20,000 in the regular force by the recent act?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No; those are being absorbed in the general Army scheme.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then the 20,000 that we have increased the Army covers all for the first year and 4,000 in excess.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The increase to the maximum strength under existing law is only temporary.

Mr. WARREN. I think this matter of construing the law could well be reached if you add the 20,000 men authorized the other day to the present Army strength and deduct that total from the proposed strength and then divide that remaining total into five parts, to show each year's increase.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Why delay an increase in the Regular Army? If we need a Regular Army, why not begin to increase it right now?

Mr. WARREN. That is a matter for consideration, of course. It has been proposed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I hope by the end of five years we can lessen the size of the Army.

Mr. WARREN. It is proposed by the General Staff that we shall make the increase in four or five increments. The House saw fit to make the total Army number smaller, but the increment in each of the four years would be about the same each year as in the Senate bill.

In reference to the inquiry of the Senator from Connecticut about the Philippine Scouts, we must not make any calculations upon using those elsewhere than in the Philippines. Without quoting any law about the matter, the formation is entirely local and is intended only for local use.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That ought to be passed on entirely by itself and not be made a part of this measure.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is the idea I had in mind. I thought they were a special force and were hardly to be considered as a part of the Regular Army. They are only adapted to use in that country as a constabulary.

Mr. DU PONT. They could not be utilized anywhere else, and, in my judgment, they ought to be excluded from all consideration in reference to the Regular Army.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I simply wanted the Senator's opinion.

Mr. DU PONT. Further, the Philippines are likely to be cast adrift, and the scouts would have to go in that event.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Georgia one way by which Congress has been able to keep the force down is by not making the appropriation. The officers of the Army can not enlist up to the authorized strength because they do not have the money to pay them, and as the enlistments expire the men go out of service.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I simply wanted the Senator's opinion as to whether the 180,000 maximum included the Philippine Scouts, so as to know how many would be deducted from effective use in this country in the event we should have war with another country by reason of the language of the Senator's amendment. In other words, if the Senator thinks a real effective Army, if we get into trouble with another country or in time of peace, should be 180,000 men, ought we not to say not including the Philippine Scouts? If the Philippine Scouts are 5,000 men, we ought to say that the maximum, including them, should be 185,000.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. We utilize the Philippine Scouts over there; they are a part of the regular force; but I do not think they would be available anywhere else.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It all depends on the judgment of Senators as to the amount of Army they want to be ready to utilize here. If the Senator thinks 175,000 would be enough over here, I have no quarrel with him about it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I may say here that so far as I am individually concerned I do not think that an Army of 180,000 men is large enough, but we can not each have what we want, and the committee felt that somewhere about that number was as much as the sentiment of the country and of Congress would warrant.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator might feel optimistic some day, and if he really thinks or if the committee thinks that the Senate or the country would stand for five or ten thousand more than he thought day before yesterday, it would not be a great calamity if he would offer an amendment then to add 10,000 more, even if it was voted down.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The committee will give the subject further consideration.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee a question, if I may. Has an estimate been made by the department as to the probable cost of maintaining an army of the size provided for in this bill?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have just read that. I will say to the Senator, if he will refer to the report of the committee on this bill he will find an estimate covering the cost. The Senator speaks about the Regular Establishment?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Yes; the maximum.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. On page 24 of the report the Senator will find a table giving the estimate made by the War Department.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me to ask the chairman of the committee a question before we take up his amendment?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no objection to the Senator asking the question.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It may be two or three questions. I have been seeking an opportunity here during the small talk which has been going on. I want to ask the chairman of the committee about section 22, which deals with the Coast Artillery Corps. What increase does the bill make in the personnel of the Coast Artillery?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. What was the Senator's question?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I was directing the Senator's attention to section 22, and I asked him what increase that makes in the personnel of the Coast Artillery Corps.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The present enlisted strength of the Coast Artillery is 19,321.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Is that the paper strength or the available strength?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is the authorized strength.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The actual available strength?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My information was that it was about 2,000 less than that.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am speaking of the authorized strength. The numbers vary a little all the time.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. What increase does the bill propose in that corps?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. To a minimum strength of 24,897.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. An increase of about 5,000?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Of 5,576.

Mr. LEWIS. May I be permitted to say to both Senators that I have had occasion lately to investigate the matter, and I fear the report is that 17,250 or 17,275 is the number of the Coast Artillery. Am I in error as to that?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Usually the enlisted personnel is limited by the appropriation. Of course in getting at these estimates the committee has had to take some fixed and definite estimate, both as to amount and as to men. The figure I refer to is the authorized strength. Perhaps the Senator has a report as to the actual strength.

Mr. LEWIS. I will say to the Senator I have no report, but being anxious about the matter I have a letter from those who assumed to report the matter to me for my personal information, sought by me connected with other matters. I have no official report from the officers of our Government.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The statement made by the Senator from Illinois agrees with my own information that there are to-day only a little over 17,000 in the Coast Artillery.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The 19,321 I speak of is the authorized strength of the Coast Artillery.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And this bill will bring the authorized strength up to 24,000?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. To 24,897.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That would be the minimum or maximum strength?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is the minimum strength.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And the President is authorized by this section to increase that?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. To a total enlisted strength of 30,009.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. For example, the increase would be 12,562 privates authorized by this bill, and the President is authorized to increase that to 15,675, which would be an increase of about 3,000.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, in the Artillery a very large proportion of enlisted men are not quoted as privates. There are privates of the first class and privates and then various definitions are given to the more skilled force of enlisted men, so the privates are not in the same proportion to the enlisted men as in the other branches of the Army. It is more as it is in the Navy. You have to take the entire list of the enlisted force in order to know just what the increase is.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It would seem to me from a hasty consideration of the provision that the authorized increase would be less than the Senator has stated. However——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let me say to the Senator that the proposed increase that I have called to his attention, 24,897, is on the proposed minimum strength. The war strength would be 30,009.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I, of course, defer to the better information and the far better judgment of the chairman of the committee upon the matter, but my information is that if we increase the Artillery Corps to this minimum strength we shall then fall far short of enough men to man the fortifications in this country; that is, we shall fall short of having men enough to man the fortifications to the extent of one-half. If that be true, it seems to me that would be unfortunate, because as it occurs to me the Coast Artillery is a very important portion of our forces.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say to the Senator, in reply, that you can get just as many different opinions on this subject as you can get men to talk with you upon the subject. This number is satisfactory to the Chief of the Coast Artillery, Gen. Weaver.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is, the minimum number?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir. I will ask to have inserted in the RECORD a statement from Gen. Weaver with reference to the Coast Artillery. His view may not be in line with the views of some of the other men in his branch of the service, but in most of these estimates—and we have given as much as they asked—we have been governed largely by the advice of the men who are at the head of these several corps.

Mr. WARREN. Will the chairman state that there is also reliance to be placed upon the Artillery Corps, militia, or National Guard?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Surely.

Mr. WARREN. Which is, of course, organized and located near these fortified points.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is in addition.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They are in the nature of reserves?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No; they work right with them. The Naval Militia and the Coast Artillery companies in the States train with the Regular Coast Artillery at certain seasons of the year.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It seems to me it is the most important branch of our land forces.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will ask the Secretary to read this statement from Gen. Weaver.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me first complete my statement. The Navy is our first line. It seems to me that it ought to be full and complete. If we are going to slight the Military Establishment in any particular, it ought not to be the Navy, and second in importance to that, in my mind, is the Coast Artillery. If we are going to take care of the Navy and are going to slight any other branches of the service, it ought not to be the Coast Artillery.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think the Senator will find that there is a very great difference of opinion among Army officers. The Coast Artillery is simply a harbor defense, and some of the officers will even go so far as to insist that it is sometimes a source of weakness, as it requires a mobile army to come to its defense in some cases where a landing has been made. I am simply stating that there is a diversity of opinion on that subject.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Every man in the Artillery Corps is probably better qualified to render service in the Infantry and to operate machine guns than any other man in the service, except a man trained specially to handle machine guns.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to have the Senator read the testimony of one or two witnesses before the committee where they state the number of men who would be required to defend the coast defenses in the northeast part of this country. I do not pretend to know, but we rely on expert testimony in reference to this subject. There is a difference of opinion among men in the Army as to the particular branch which ought to be increased. In any event, the statement of Gen. Weaver will show that the proposal of the Senate committee meets with his approbation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should be very glad to hear it read.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask to have it read.

Mr. DU PONT. Before it is read I should like to say to the Senator from Utah that I think all military men agree that while the Coast Artillery is of great importance for the defense of special points and special cities it is not the most important factor of our system of defense on land. The presence of a mobile army is next to the Navy the great factor of national defense. The Artillery defends a few isolated, separated points near which great cities are situated. The enemy could land at a hundred other points and there should be a mobile army to meet them.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me ask the Senator why we build fortifications?

Mr. DU PONT. To prevent our Artillery from being at the mercy of a few ships of war.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The fortifications are useful or else we would not build them.

Mr. DU PONT. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Are the fortifications of any use unless they are manned?

Mr. DU PONT. No; they should be manned; but the rank in importance is simply this: First in importance, considering the whole scheme of defense, is the Navy, and, in my opinion, the mobile army is the second.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then the Senator from Delaware does not agree with the officer who was quoted by the chairman of the committee a moment ago——

Mr. DU PONT. That may be, but——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me finish my question. I say the Senator evidently does not agree with the statement that was made a moment ago that the Coast Artillery is rather a source of weakness than otherwise?

Mr. DU PONT. No; I do not agree with that at all.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They are a source of strength.

Mr. DU PONT. A source of strength.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It seems to me that if coast fortifications are necessary and useful, it is of the highest importance that they should be sufficiently manned.

Mr. DU PONT. I will repeat the remark I made a few moments ago, that while the Coast Artillery is of the utmost importance in the special localities which it defends, and should be kept at those places in a state of efficiency and ready for all emergencies, still, in the general problem of national defense, I consider it secondary to the mobile army, which is the first factor. That is not my opinion alone, but is the general concensus of the opinions of military men, as the Senator will perceive if he will read the testimony which was taken before the Senate committee.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs a question or two for information.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. May we not first have this paper read, I will ask the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NELSON. Yes, sir.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

NEED FOR 93 ADDITIONAL COMPANIES OF COAST ARTILLERY.

The Coast Artillery Corps at present comprises 170 companies. This number is 93 companies short of the number required to man one-half the armament now provided. If war should be declared to-morrow there are coast fortifications which have been provided and installed at the expense of $41,000,000 (530 heavy guns and one hundred and twenty-eight 12-inch mortars), which could not be used, because Congress has not provided the manning bodies for them.

The existing armament is inadequate. The War Department has recommended that large additions be made thereto during the next four years. The fortification bill to be reported this year will carry large sums for additional seacoast armament. The inconsistency on the part of Congress of appropriating for additional seacoast armament and at the same time failing to provide trained personnel for half the armament already provided is obvious.

The long-established policy of the War Department contemplates that the regular Coast Artillery personnel should be sufficient to man the fortifications in the insular possessions and one-half the fortifications in the United States. This policy has been repeatedly recommended by the General Staff and by the War Department. It may be said that no responsible military agency cognizant of all the appurtenant facts has come to any conclusion other than that the strength of the Coast Artillery called for in this policy is the minimum that should be provided in the interests of national security. Ninety-three additional companies of Coast Artillery, the number called for under the Senate bill, is the number needed to carry out this policy.

Coast fortifications form, with the Navy, our first line of defense. Unless they are efficient an enemy, without setting foot on our shores, can destroy our seacoast cities. If the Navy be strong enough to control the sea, an enemy can not invade our country, but he can and will attack our seacoast cities by naval fire unless they are adequately protected by seacoast fortifications. The duties of Coast Artillery troops of a highly technical and scientific nature, and such troops must be provided and trained in time of peace. What explanation could be offered to the country if in time of war our fortifications, provided by Congress at great cost, should prove impotent because of failure of Congress to provide the necessary personnel for their operation?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that we have increased the Coast Artillery Corps just exactly as Gen. Weaver wanted it done?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The statement which has just been read from the desk, as I understand, is Gen. Weaver's statement.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The statement just read from the desk bears out precisely what I thought and had suggested about it, namely, the absolute necessity of sufficiently and thoroughly manning our coast fortifications. It is true, this bill provides for 93 additional companies, but I do not understand that they are to be full companies, because the bill limits the total number of men; and when the companies are filled as the President is authorized to fill them, then there will be some four or five thousand more men than are provided for in the bill.

Mr. DU PONT. Six thousand.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I want to suggest to the chairman of the committee for his consideration, in view of the extreme importance of this branch of the service, as shown in the statement which has just been read from the desk, whether it would not be better to provide in the bill at once for the maximum number, which would be 5,000 or 6,000 more, and then provide that the President, at his discretion, might reduce the number to the minimum that is provided; in other words, to reverse the provisions of the bill and, instead of fixing the minimum amount and authorizing the President to increase it to the maximum, to fix the maximum amount and authorize him to decrease it to the minimum.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Where will the Senator stop with that? That would disorganize the whole plan of having a minimum, a certain proportion less than the maximum. If you increase this branch of the service to the maximum strength, what will you do with the balance of the other different arms of the service?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. You will leave the balance as they are. It does not disorganize the balance of the service. Because you provide for a distinct branch of the service in that way, it does not affect the remainder of it. It is true it is adopting a somewhat different plan, but it does not disorganize the other branches, because they are separate and distinct. I make that suggestion for the consideration of the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I occupy the same position as does the Senator from Utah with regard to the importance of keeping up the efficiency of our Coast Artillery. My understanding of the situation is that we are carrying out a policy that has been in operation for some time in theory and are making it one in practice; that is, we are supplying 100 per cent of the forces necessary for our insular fortifications, 50 per cent of the needed forces for our continental coast fortifications, the other 50 per cent which may be needed in emergencies to be supplied from the National Guard of the respective States where those fortifications are.

When Gen. Weaver was before our committee I asked him specifically with reference to that subject, and such was his information. I then asked him whether the militia of the seaboard cities were equipped for work so as to be as efficient as the regular force. His answer was:

> What we have done along this line is this: We have equipped their armories with dummy armament and accessories thereto, which enables them to conduct drill in their armories, including all the features necessary for range finding and serving guns, ammunition, etc. The system contemplates that they come to the fortifications for a period each year and put into actual practice at the fortifications the armory instruction they have had during the winter. They are able to have in the armories practically all of the essential instruction, except the firing of projectiles, and for that, in substitution of the firing of full-size projectiles, they have subcaliber practice in firing at miniature targets.

I believe that the wise course with reference to our Coast Artillery is to keep it at, I will not say maximum efficiency, but at practically that; and the National Guard force which is in training, as Gen. Weaver said, as a reserve force to be used in case of emergency. I do not suppose it will be possible to enact any measure—that is, to carry it through both Houses—which would accomplish that; but it has always seemed to me, to put it mildly, unwise and improper to spend millions of dollars in the erection of coast fortifications and then to deprive those fortifications of the one thing needful to make them effective, and that is a sufficient number of men behind the guns. It seems, however, that it has always been the case to supply a small proportion of the force necessary—I say "always," but it has been so for some time—and to rely upon the National Guard to supplement that force in the event that occasion should arise for their full use. I do not think it is good policy, but I do not believe we are going to be able to change it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I thoroughly agree with what the Senator from Colorado has so well said.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I want to ask the chairman of the committee, if it will not embarrass him, for information in respect to the Cavalry. What changes does the bill effect in the personnel of the Cavalry? What is the present strength of the Cavalry and what will be the strength under this bill?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Under the existing law there are 15 Cavalry regiments, having an enlisted strength of 12,240. This bill increases the number of Cavalry regiments to 25, or an increase of 10 regiments, and increases the enlisted strength of the Cavalry to 24,900 men.

Mr. NELSON. That is the peace strength?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is the minimum strength.

Mr. NELSON. Now, another question, if the chairman will allow me, in connection with the Cavalry. I have received complaints that in the matter of promotion Cavalry officers by this bill, or, at all events, by the House bill, are placed at a disadvantage in comparison with Artillery and Infantry officers. Can the chairman give me any information on that point?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is no question, Mr. President, that at one time or another, as one branch of the service is increased by increasing the number of its units, the number of vacant places increases, and the officers of the particular branch where the increase is greatest are promoted more rapidly than are the officers of some other branch the number of units of which remains more or less stationary. In those organizations where the increase is small or where there is no change at all, promotions are slow, and the officers of such organizations suffer in that respect, if it may be called suffering, while in those organizations where the number of units has been largely increased promotions are more rapid.

Now, let me say to the Senator further that that condition has confronted the Military Committee in one shape or another ever since I have been a member of that committee, and we are confronted now with the question of equalization of promotion, so that the men in the different branches may fare somewhat alike.

Mr. NELSON. That is what I referred to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. For instance, take the present conditions. Some of the branches of the Army were increased out of proportion to some of the others, and therefore the promotions in the particular branches so increased have been more rapid than promotions in the branches which have not changed much. In order to try to equalize promotions, we have appointed a subcommittee to take the matter up and to report to the full committee some plan for the equalization of promotions in each branch of the service.

Mr. NELSON. Is that plan to be made a part of this bill?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir. We are going to try to do that; but let me say to the Senator that it is not an easy proposition to settle. We have discussed it time and time again. If the subcommittee fails to agree, then the whole committee will have to take it up and do the very best they can.

Mr. NELSON. I hope that question will be settled, because I have had a good many complaints about the disadvantages which officers in the Cavalry service have suffered in the past.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendments proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

The SECRETARY. On page 111, after line 12, at the end of section 6, the section pertaining to the General Staff Corps, it is proposed to add the following:

> The President shall detail five officers of the National Guard, of not less than 10 years' service, who shall constitute an additional section of the General Staff, to be known as the National Guard section. Such officers shall be detailed as follows: One for a term of one year; one for a term of two years; one for a term of three years; and two for a term of four years; and after the expiration of each detail the successor shall be detailed for a period of four years unless such detailed officers shall be sooner relieved. In the event of a vacancy in this section the detail shall be for the unexpired term. No officer having served in this section of the General Staff shall be again detailed for such service within two years after the service has ceased. National Guard officers so serving shall receive the pay and allowances of officers of similar grade in the Regular Army.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not know how the chairman of the committee or the members of the committee view this amendment. I have had some reason to think that it would not be opposed. If, however, it is opposed, I desire to submit some reasons for its adoption. I ask the Senator from Oregon, the chairman of the committee, whether he desires to go on with the discussion this evening?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to go on until 6 o'clock, if the Senator is prepared to go on.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am prepared, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, before the Senator proceeds I should like to send an amendment to the desk to be read.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have no disposition to interfere with the proposed discussion of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa; but if I understand the correct proceeding, we ought to dispose of the Senate committee amendments before other amendments are offered to the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We have disposed of all but one, and that one went over by consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia has asked that an amendment sent to the desk by him may be read. The Chair presumes the Senator from Iowa will not object.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no objection whatever.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment sent to the desk by the Senator from Georgia.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, after section 29, the following:

SEC. 29a. In addition to the work connected with the military service soldiers on active duty hereafter enlisting shall devote as many hours as can be so used without neglecting their military duties and, if practicable, an average of 96 hours monthly to study and to receiving instructions upon educational lines not directly connected with the military service and preparatory to their return to civil life. A part of this preparation for civil life shall consist of vocational education either in agriculture or the mechanic arts, and civilian teachers may be employed to aid the Army officers in conducting the said educational work. The Secretary of War, with the approval of the President, shall prescribe rules and regulations for conducting the instructions preparatory for civil life herein provided for.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa also yield to me to offer an amendment and have it read, printed, and lie on the table?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. I send the amendment to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 189, line 4, after the word "units," it is proposed to insert "and every officer of higher rank than that of captain," so that the text will read:

To captains commanding companies or similar units and every officer of higher rank than that of captain, $500.

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to have the amendment of the Senator from Iowa again stated.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say to the Senator that I am going to suggest a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock, and the amendment will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. CUMMINS. As I understand, the Senator does not desire to have the argument go on at this time?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No. I will suggest to the Senator that most of the Senators prefer to go on with this matter to-morrow and to take a recess at this time.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well.

RECESS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, March 31, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 30, 1916.

The House met at 10.30 a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We draw near to Thee, our Father in heaven, with open hearts, that we may receive the inspiration which Thou alone canst impart; that with clearness of thought, honesty of purpose, and patriotic fervor we may render unto Thee and to our fellow men a service which shall increase the genius and efficiency of popular government and fulfill the demands of the growing changes in our civilization, moving ever onward and upward to larger life and nobler achievements; and blessing and honor and praise be Thine, in His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

REPRINT OF A BILL.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, the first print of the bill (H. R. 410) to establish a flood protection and drainage fund and to provide for the protection, drainage, and reclamation of the overflowed and swamp lands in the United States, and so forth, has been exhausted. This bill, introduced by the Speaker, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], is a very important measure, one in which my State is vitally interested and in which, I believe, the entire country is interested. This fact is demonstrated by the exhaustion of the first print. I have taken this matter up with the chairman of the committee and he stated that he would be present this morning, but I find he is not here. He has no objection to a reprint, and I ask unanimous consent that 500 copies of the bill be ordered reprinted.

Mr. MANN. It does not require an order of the House to have a reprint of a bill. The chairman of the Committee on Printing has the power to order it.

Mr. SEARS. I have tried to get some copies of this bill, and it is immaterial to me how I secure them; but on account of the importance of the bill, which is a good one, I would like to have it reprinted.

Mr. MANN. I shall not object, although the Committee on Printing has the power to order a reprint without action of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida said he had consulted with the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SEARS. I consulted with the chairman of the committee, and he has no objection to my making this request, and, in fact, the request is made with his knowledge and consent.

Mr. MANN. I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

IMMIGRATION.

Under the order heretofore made the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10384) to regulate the immigration of aliens to, and the residence of aliens in, the United States, with Mr. SAUNDERS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 38, line 24, strike out the words "of the United States Public Health Service."

Mr. BENNET. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] that that was the amendment to which we agreed on Tuesday, but no vote was taken on the amendment.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, that is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 10, line 23, for the purpose of modifying an amendment known as the Humphrey amendment, so that it will relate only to contiguous countries.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to return to page 10, line 23, for the purpose indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Reserving the right to object, what does the gentleman desire to do?

Mr. SIEGEL. To modify the gentleman's amendment so that it will apply to territory contiguous to the United States, which was the object when it was presented.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 23, following the colon, insert:

"Provided further, That whenever any foreign country contiguous to the United States shall by statute, executive order, or otherwise, exclude from its territory any class or classes of citizens of the United States upon grounds different from the grounds for excluding aliens from the United States herein specified, the same class or classes of aliens residing in such contiguous country shall be excluded from the United States so long as such exclusion of United States citizens continues."

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a telegram which gives the reasons for confining this provision to countries contiguous to the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to insert the telegram to which he refers. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The telegram is as follows:

NEW YORK, March 29, 1916.

Hon. WILLIAM S. BENNET,
Washington, D. C.:

Humphrey amendment to immigration bill, providing for reciprocal exclusion, is destructive of every American tradition. It violates the doctrine of expatriation, to which we are wedded and which has been recognized in the platforms of all of the political parties. It interferes with the right of asylum, which has been a cherished American doctrine. So far as the Russian Jew is concerned, it will exclude him altogether, because Russia has steadfastly forbidden American Jews to enter her domain, even though they bear an American passport. She persists in this contention notwithstanding the abrogation by a unanimous vote of Congress of the treaty of 1832, and has thus far failed to negotiate a new treaty; consequently the class of immigrants who are conceded to occupy an exceptional position because of the persecution and discrimination to which they are subjected would find the doors of opportunity closed to them. This amendment should therefore be rejected, and in any event so qualified as to prevent it from becoming the medium of injustice and cruelty.

LOUIS MARSHALL.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 19. That at any time within five years after entry, any alien who at the time of entry was a member of one or more of the classes excluded by law; any alien who shall have entered or who shall be found in the United States in violation of this act, or in violation of any other law of the United States; any alien who after entry shall be found advocating or teaching the unlawful destruction of property, or advocating or teaching anarchy, or the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States or of all forms of law or the assassination of public officials; any alien who within five years after entry becomes a public charge from causes not affirmatively shown to have arisen subsequent to landing; except as hereinafter provided, any alien who is hereafter sentenced to imprisonment for a term of one year or more because of conviction in this country of a crime involving moral turpitude, committed within five year after the entry of the alien to the United States; any alien who shall be found an inmate of or connected with the management of a house of prostitution or practicing prostitution after such alien shall have entered the United States, or who shall receive, share in, or derive benefit from any part of the earnings of any prostitute; any alien who manages or is employed by, in, or in connection with any house of prostitution or music or dance hall or other place of amusement or resort habitually frequented by prostitutes, or where prostitutes gather, or who in any way assists any prostitute or protects or promises to protect from arrest any prostitute; any alien who shall import or attempt to import any person for the purpose of prostitution or for any other immoral purpose; any alien who, after being excluded and deported or arrested and deported as a prostitute, or as a procurer, or as having been connected with the business of prostitution or importation for prostitution or other immoral purposes in any of the ways hereinbefore specified, shall return to and enter the United States; any alien convicted and imprisoned for a violation of any of the provisions of section 4 hereof; at any time within three years after entry, any alien who shall have entered the United States by water at any time or place other than as designated by immigration officials, or by land at any place other than one designated as a port of entry for aliens by the Commissioner General of Immigration, or at any time not designated by immigration officials, or who enters without inspection, shall, upon the warrant of the Secretary of Labor, be taken into custody and deported: Provided, That for the purposes of this act, the marriage to an American citizen of a female of the sexually immoral classes the exclusion or deportation of which is prescribed by this act shall not invest such female with United States citizenship: Provided further, That the provision of this section respecting the deportation of aliens convicted of a crime involving moral turpitude shall not apply to one who has been pardoned, nor shall such deportation be made or directed if the court sentencing such alien for such crime shall, at the time of imposing judgment or passing sentence, make a recommendation to the Secretary of Labor that such alien shall not be deported in pursuance of this act; nor shall any alien convicted as aforesaid be deported until after the termination of his imprisonment: Provided further, That the provisions of this section, with the exceptions hereinbefore noted, shall be applicable to the classes of aliens therein mentioned irrespective of the time of their entry into the United States: Provided further, That the provisions of this section shall also apply to the cases of aliens who come to the mainland of the United States from the insular possessions thereof: Provided further, That any person who shall be arrested under the provisions of this section, on the ground that he has entered or been found in the United States in violation of any other law thereof which imposes on such person the burden of proving his right to enter or remain, and who shall fail to establish the existence of the right claimed, shall be deported to the place specified in such other law. In every case where any person is ordered deported from the United States under the provision of this act, or of any law or treaty now existing, the decision of the Secretary of Labor shall be final.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, there are one or two committee amendments. On page 39, line 14, after the word "who," I move to insert the words "at any time."

That will provide that those who are here, advocating or teaching the unlawful destruction of property at any time, shall be deported, so that there will be no question of a time limit.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Let the amendment be reported. The Clerk has not reported it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 39, line 14, after the word "who," insert the words "at any time."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether that would apply to an alien who had developed the practice or idea of advocating the unlawful destruction of property since he came to this country?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes; if he advocates or teaches it. The purpose of it is so that there shall not be any time limit to the deportation of those who teach anarchy after they come over here.

Mr. LONDON. The expression is "shall be found"—shall be found by whom?

Mr. BURNETT. By anybody; of course proof has to be made.

Mr. LONDON. Who shall determine the fact?

Mr. BURNETT. The immigration authorities.

Mr. LONDON. Why not say a court of competent authority?

Mr. BURNETT. They have their rights by habeas corpus; that is not destroyed.

Mr. LONDON. They have not any rights under the habeas corpus act by this immigration act.

Mr. MANN. Is not the right of habeas corpus destroyed?

Mr. LONDON. Completely destroyed.

Mr. MANN. Does not the section provide that the Secretary may have a man arrested, and the man has to prove his case, and that the decision of the Secretary is final?

Mr. BURNETT. The only change made in this bill from the bill that was vetoed is that we do not want a time limit of five years to apply to it. Some of the excluded classes have a time limit of five years, and after five years they are not deportable; but those who teach anarchy and the destruction of property ought not to fall within that time limit.

Mr. MANN. I understand; but if the Secretary orders a man arrested for deportation, the man himself has to make proof, and the decision of the Secretary is final, so that it does wipe out any proceeding under the right of habeas corpus.

Mr. BURNETT. I know that the habeas corpus is frequently invoked in many immigration cases.

Mr. MANN. Under existing law; but the last proviso of this section makes the decision of the Secretary final. It says:

Provided further, That any person who shall be arrested under the provisions of this section, on the ground that he has entered or been found in the United States in violation of any other law thereof which imposes on such person the burden of proving his right to enter or remain, and who shall fail to establish the existence of the right claimed, shall be deported to the place specified in such other law. In every case where any person is ordered deported from the United States under the provision of this act, or of any law or treaty now existing, the decision of the Secretary of Labor shall be final.

Mr. BURNETT. Possibly so. Who else would decide it? Does the gentleman think he should have the right to resort to the courts? They have to make out a prima facie case, and then the burden is on the alien.

Mr. MANN. There is nothing here that requires anybody to make out a prima facie case. We may assume, and I think properly, that the Secretary will not order anybody arrested unless a case is made out; but he can, and his decision is made final and the burden of proof is put on the person arrested under the last proviso of this section.

Mr. BURNETT. I understand that; but, at the same time, there must be proof to the Secretary of Labor that he is found doing it.

Mr. MANN. We will assume that the Secretary would not order a man arrested without some kind of a case being made out, although there is nothing in the section that requires him to wait. He can order the arrest at any time on the ground that he is an alien, and I am not sure but that he could arrest the gentleman from Alabama or me on the ground that we were aliens, and his decision would be final, if that is constitutional.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama and myself conferred in relation to this amendment yesterday. I am in entire sympathy with the amendment, but I do think that I ought to call the attention of the gentleman from Alabama to the fact that there has been only one act passed by Congress within the last 10 years that was declared unconstitutional and that is section 3 of the immigration act of 1907, and in that there was an intimation in the opinion of Judge Holmes—and if not in that case in a prior case—that you could not provide that an alien could be deported at any time; that there had to be a limit, and that the length of time for deportation was analogous to the time in which a person could be naturalized. If the gentleman will recollect, when we came to draft the amendment subsequently we put in a five-year limit in relation to deportation of alien criminals, because of that feeling that possibly Congress had no right to provide for deportation after the time in which the alien could be naturalized. I am going to vote for the amendment if the gentleman persists in it.

Mr. BURNETT. That decision has been overruled in the Lapina case. The question came up in that case and the decision was that Congress might fix it so that there would be no time limit. The gentleman will remember that two years ago there was introduced, and the committee reported, a bill that there should be no time limit as to the commission of an offense involving moral turpitude even if it was in this country. It was claimed that that was in violation of a constitutional right, and the Secretary of Labor was to determine it.

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman may be correct, but I thought I would call his attention to the old contention that we had no authority to enact such a law, and to what was done when we came to the conclusion that we would put the five-year limit on in relation to deportation.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I move the following amendment:

Strike out, on page 39, line 15, the words "advocating or teaching the unlawful destruction of property," and in line 18 the words "all forms of law."

Mr. MANN. That is not a substitute.

Mr. LONDON. It is instead of the amendment offered by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must make his amendment germane.

Mr. LONDON. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will offer the amendment later. I move to strike out the last word of the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last word of the committee amendment.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I will offer my amendment a little later. I desire to emphasize the fact that the expression "the destruction of property," as well as the expression "all forms of law," have absolutely no meaning whatever.

The advocacy or teaching of unlawful destruction of property is a crime, and it is reached by subsequent provisions contained in the same section. The section provides that an alien who shall have been convicted of a crime shall be deported. The expressions I complain of have no meaning, except that it will become possible for some employers during strikes to remove the strike leaders by charging them with advocating or teaching the unlawful destruction of property, and in that way, without due process of law, to deprive the strike leader of trial by jury, and of his day in court. He will be taken before a board of special inquiry, consisting of laymen, where he has no right to be represented by counsel. He will be deprived of the right of resorting to the writ of habeas corpus.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Is the gentleman able to state a single case to the House where any man who has come to the United States from any country in the world was ever deported for the reasons stated by the gentleman?

Mr. LONDON. Oh, I know of cases of men who assisted workers during strikes, and who were treated by the authorities in defiance of all law, and you will find in the official report of the Industrial Commission that the law has not been administered honestly, justly, or equally in labor disputes.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has asked the gentleman a question, whether anyone has ever been deported for this reason. Of course he was not, because it was not in the law.

Mr. LONDON. There was no such provision.

Mr. SABATH. It is now for the first time placed in this bill.

Mr. LONDON. The expression "of all forms of law" has no meaning. The expression "advocating or teaching anarchy" has no meaning. Anarchy in the philosophical sense is the highest realization of democracy, that state of democracy in which government as an institution, separate and distinct from the people, will cease to exist. Under that definition of anarchy Jefferson would be an anarchist; under that definition of anarchy Emerson would be an anarchist. I do retain the expression "or the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States * * * or the assassination of public officials," because that means something. The man who advocates the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States is a dangerous man, although England, with her great constitutional system of law, has permitted people to talk themselves blue in the face, even to the extent of advocating violence and assassination, with the result that the English people have never had a single act of assassination, while Italy and Spain and all other countries that prohibit free speech, that do not give men a chance to express themselves, have suffered from repeated acts of assassination. Mr. Chairman, may I ask for an extension of five minutes?

Mr. BURNETT. I would have no objection to the gentleman having three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has not yet expired.

Mr. LONDON. I am aware of that, but I find I will not be able to say what I want to say within the five minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does the gentleman indorse the editorial expressions of certain foreign-born editors of class newspapers who ask workingmen to destroy private property, to let dyes run in silk mills, to let threads drop, and to drive great spikes into saw logs secretly—in a word, endeavor to teach men to practice everything that will ruin industry?

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, everything that tends to violence in the labor movement is destructive of the labor movement. That is why I am a Socialist; that is why we seek to guide discontent into the intelligent channels of political action. That is why I despise the man, whether he be an anarchist or any other kind of a reactionary, who does not resort to methods outside. The most absurd and incendiary pronouncements come not from foreign editors, but from Central Western States and Western States, where people have become accustomed to talk with absolutely no control of their tongues by their brains.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is there not a faction, known as the Red Socialists, or the Direct Actionists, who advocate that very thing, the destruction of property?

Mr. LONDON. The so-called anarchist movement was suppressed long ago.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am not talking about the anarchist movement. I am talking about the Red Socialist movement, the Direct Actionists.

Mr. LONDON. The Direct Actionist movement and the expression "direct action" I will hardly be able to explain in three minutes; but I want to say this, that the expression "direct action" means nothing more nor less than action which assumes an economic character; than the right to strike. It means absolutely nothing more. It is frequently misinterpreted and misunderstood. What is direct action? It is the right to strike. Instead of relying upon the politician who promises things before election and then disappoints the constituents, the Direct Actionist says, "Do not rely on the politician, but rely on strikes." I personally believe in the right to strike, provided it is conducted in an intelligent manner and provided it is a strike to improve conditions. At the same time I advocate the need of political action and the educational value of political activity.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. BENNET. Would the initiative, referendum, and recall as it exists in some States come under the term "direct action"?

Mr. LONDON. The initiative, referendum, and recall is a form of direct political action, undoubtedly. But what I want to make clear to you is that I am not advocating the use of violence. We succeeded in crushing the anarchist movement more than 20 years ago; there is no trace of it left. I object to these provisions. They were put in in good faith, but by people who did not realize the effect and the danger lurking in these provisions. I would not permit a board of special inquiry to pass on the question of whether a man is advocating or teaching the unlawful destruction of property.

An amendment should be adopted providing that he must be found by a court of competent jurisdiction to have been advocating or teaching the unlawful destruction of property. Why not adopt the suggestion? Why not say that a court of competent jurisdiction shall determine the issue? You will then give a man a chance to have his day in court and defend himself instead of rushing him before a board of special inquiry, where there is absolutely no opportunity offered to a man to defend himself.

That is why, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I ask the chairman of the committee to change the provisions of section 19 by striking out the expression "advocating or teaching the unlawful destruction of property" and the expression "or of all forms of law" and substitute instead the expression "any alien who after entry shall have been found by a court of competent jurisdiction guilty of the crime of advocating," and so forth.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman want to strike out the provision which prohibits the entry of those advocating or teaching the unlawful destruction of property?

Mr. LONDON. It has no meaning. The advocating or teaching of the unlawful destruction of property is criminal.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman's amendment was not written, and I wanted to know whether he wanted to strike out that.

Mr. LONDON. I asked that it be stricken out because it has no meaning in view of the provisions contained in this section.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, this has been the law from time immemorial, "of advocating or teaching anarchy or the overthrow of all forms of law." Now the gentleman wants to change what has been existing law for years so as to make it that the Secretary of Labor and back of him the Secretary of Commerce and back of him the Secretary of the Treasury, when they have jurisdiction of these matters, should not be the ones who decide conclusively and finally upon these questions. Again, this simply puts in those who advocate or teach the unlawful destruction of property and who teach the overthrow of all forms of law. This contention of the gentleman is like anarchy itself. We can not desire that anarchists, such men as oppose all forms of law, should be allowed to continue to come here until by the long, slow process of courts we shall determine their rights, and that in the meanwhile the anarchists can continue to ply their work. I hope that the amendment of the gentleman will not be adopted. We want to suppress just such things as have been occurring within this country within the last few months, and we do not want a lot of men to run roughshod over law and then appeal to a long-delayed snail-paced court to encourage somebody else to ply their trade instead of making an example of them. It is just as stated by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] awhile ago, that there is an organization of people in the country who are teaching just such things as that. As to the political refugee, he is provided for in a section we have already adopted. It is the individuals who are going over the country destroying property and teaching the destruction of all forms of law at which this is aimed. The same law has existed as to prostitutes, the same law has existed as to anarchists, the same law has existed as to many other classes of people, and it simply puts these people who think like anarchists, and who——

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. Why should the gentleman draw a distinction between a crime involving the advocacy of an unlawful destruction of property and any other serious crime involving moral turpitude? Why should not the man have an opportunity to have his day in court? How can the gentleman from Alabama imply a contempt for the courts of this country and expose himself to the charge of a contempt for law and legal institutions?

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, the statement of the gentleman as to my position in regard to contempt of courts from what I have said, the very attitude he has taken in regard to this matter, is something that makes his opinion to me indifferent. It is for the protection of the whole country that this law is aimed at.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The question here seems to be whether or not we should leave with the Secretary of Labor the final disposition of these cases and the deportation of aliens.

Mr. BURNETT. That has been the law.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is not that covered sufficiently on page 41, in the first three lines, where it provides that "upon the warrant of the Secretary of Labor," and so forth, the party shall "be taken into custody and deported"? We have discussed this frequently before, and there is just this merit in it. There may be a prejudiced Secretary of Labor. He may be one who is wholly in favor of immigration or he may be bitterly opposed to it, and in such a case the rights of an alien, if he had any under the American law, might be very much prejudiced by a Secretary whose mind was already made up on the subject.

You seem to be taking away from the alien the writ of habeas corpus. I think there ought to be some chance for a man who is thus seized.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last two words. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask the gentleman from Alabama if he does not think that authority already given to the Secretary is sufficient, without going to the extreme here of making his decision in the matter final?

Mr. BURNETT. There has to be some finality about it, and that has been the law all the time; and the courts have so held. And I am just informed by the law agent that if the Secretary renders an unfair decision, unwarranted by the law, the courts are open, and have been, and there have been many trials under habeas corpus and many reversals of decisions.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. I yield.

Mr. SABATH. If that is the case, could there be any possible objection to us embodying the provision that the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] desire?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is mistaken as to my position. I contend for the keeping out of those who teach the unlawful destruction of property. I had a great deal to do with putting that clause in the bill, and I want it to stand. I do not think a man who comes in from a foreign country and teaches the destruction of property in the United States should be permitted to remain; but the trouble here is that a Secretary of Labor, be he Republican, Democrat, or Socialist, might be prejudiced upon this subject of immigration and a man who is seized and charged by somebody with having thus taught is at once at the mercy of an officer who may be prejudiced.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. POWERS. Even though we should attempt to abolish the writ of habeas corpus, the gentleman knows, I take it, that we could not do it without changing the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. You ought not to abolish the writ of habeas corpus.

Mr. POWERS. The Constitution of the United States provides we can not do it without it, the Constitution, is changed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. You attempt to do it here by making the decision of the Secretary of Labor final. You have sufficient law on page 41. All of these prohibited classes are to be deported after five years, or within a period of five years, or "at any time" as may be determined, and they are to be taken into custody upon the warrant of the Secretary of Labor. A man has a chance to get into court, as this bill provides on page 41, but on page 43 the power of the Secretary is increased and his decision in the matter is to be final, and therefore the accused has no right to appeal to the decision of the court. It is just possible that a man may express himself freely in public against some of our laws—and there are so many laws that there is no reason why a man should not protest against some of them—and, if apprehended, may be deported on the charge of designing persons, with no appeal from the decision of the Secretary of Labor. The testimony of those who report the man is presented to the Secretary, and on his dictum the man goes out of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 40, line 1, change the semicolon to a comma and insert "or who is hereafter sentenced more than once to such a term of imprisonment because of conviction in this country of any crime involving moral turpitude committed at any time after entry."

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, this is one of the sections of the bill which provides for the deportation of aliens who have actually been admitted into the United States. This particular section provides for the deportation of aliens who have committed offenses involving moral turpitude. The proviso that I desire to amend is this:

Any alien who is hereafter sentenced to imprisonment for a term of one year or more because of conviction in this country of a crime involving moral turpitude committed within five years after the entry of this alien.

My amendment provides that after a second offense committed by such an alien, or where he has been for the second time convicted, the five-year limitation should not apply. In other words, even though he may have been residing in the United States for five years or more, if he is for the second time convicted of any offense or crime involving moral turpitude, he should be deported. The provisions in this act covering the majority of cases place the limitation at five years.

A little later on, after the adoption of this amendment, I am going to move to reduce the term from five years to three years, but I am offering this amendment to demonstrate that I have no desire to protect a real criminal, a man who is a criminal at heart, a man who is guilty of a second offense involving moral turpitude and for the second time is convicted. A man of that kind is a criminal and is not entitled to consideration on the part of any of the citizens of the United States.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I will.

Mr. MANN. Suppose a man had lived in this country 50 years and was still an alien, and came under the provision of the gentleman's amendment, where would he be deported to?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; to the country of which he is still a citizen.

I wish to say to my colleague from Illinois and the gentlemen of the House that I have strenuously opposed in the committee the five-year provision in this bill. I realize the hardship upon a man who has been a resident of this country for a number of years and then, through misfortune, commits an offense that might be considered a crime involving moral turpitude and is deported.

In view of the fact that the committee insisted upon doing away with any time limit whatever, in order to secure at least that five-year concession from the committee, I yielded for the time being and agreed to support the proposition that any alien who is sentenced for the second time for committing a second crime involving moral turpitude should be deported, and that no time limitation should apply to him.

Mr. MANN. I understand. We have a statute which deprives an American citizen of citizenship if he remains abroad for a certain length of time and does not comply with certain provisions of law. I should naturally think that some of the foreign countries would have some provisions of that kind that would deprive one of its citizens of his natural citizenship after a number of years. Could we not, notwithstanding that, deport him to that other country on the ground that he was a habitual criminal?

Mr. SABATH. We could under a provision of the old act, namely, that provision which pertains to the deportation of prostitues and people concerned in or connected with prostitution. There is no limitation as to them, as I understand. If I am not mistaken, the Supreme Court has construed the section to be constitutional, and we deport aliens under it very frequently. In fact, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, we debarred 490 prostitues and procurers from entering the United States, and we deported an additional 214 prostitues and procurers who had actually gained admittance to the United States.

Mr. MANN. They do not live that long.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH]. The gentleman is mistaken, however, in his idea that the committee wanted to remove the time limit as to those committing offenses in this country—the first offense. The police commissioner of New York was before the committee, and he showed an alarming condition in the prisons in regard to aliens who commit crimes after they come here, and he insisted that there should be no time limit as to the deportation of any of them this side of final citizenship. We believed, however, that it was a harsh rule, and every member of the committee believed that it would be a harsh rule—that if a man had come over here without any criminal record behind him being shown, and had lived an upright life here for 5 or 10 or 15 years, and then was convicted of a crime, to deport him would be unjust. Hence, we did not agree with the suggestion of the police commissioner of New York, who showed us an alarming number of records of prisoners who had come over and committed crimes after they had come here.

But the suggestion was then made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] that those who committed a second crime involving moral turpitude showed then a criminal heart and a criminal tendency, and they should then be deported; and the committee unanimously agreed with the gentleman that that ought to be done. The police commissioner wrote me a letter, in which he stated that upon examination of the prison records he found that there were a great many of those cases, of men who served out their sentences and then renewed their careers of crime.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. As a matter of curiosity, where one of these aliens commits a crime that subjects him to deportation, when is he deported?

Mr. BURNETT. My idea is that it is done after the expiration of the sentence.

Mr. MANN. It says here, on line 6, "hereafter sentenced."

Mr. BURNETT. There is a proviso later on that provides that it shall be after the expiration of the sentence.

Mr. MANN. There may be another proviso, but I do not at the moment locate it.

Mr. BURNETT. We think that that is taken care of, but I think it is a wise suggestion on the part of the gentleman.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. The police commissioner of New York told us what percentage of the prisoners were aliens. He said 38 per cent of the prisoners in New York were aliens, and in Pennsylvania the percentage was 34, and in Rhode Island 35, and that the same percentage runs throughout the Eastern States generally.

Mr. BURNETT. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that it was not the idea of the committee that there should be no limitation as to the first conviction, but on the commission of the second offense, showing that the man was really a criminal at heart, we believed that he ought to be deported.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] has just called attention to the percentage of alien criminals in two or three States. I could never understand why, when gentlemen do that, they should not at the same time call attention to the percentage of aliens in the population. Now, the percentage of aliens in the population of New York State is somewhere around 31 or 32 per cent, so that the percentage of criminals is substantially the same as the percentage of aliens in the population.

Then here is the unfairness, not of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS], but of the statistics in all this, unless it is explained: Of course the native-born child of foreign-born parents is properly and necessarily classed as a native-born citizen, because he is; and therefore when they charge up the statistics as to crimes they do not take into account the very high standing of the children of the immigrants. They class them, of course, as native born, as they ought, and do not take them into account.

I will tell you what these statistics are largely made up of. There are a whole lot of Greeks in New York City, for instance, who sell shoe laces, and so forth. Sometimes they stand more than five minutes on a corner and are arrested for that so-called offense and taken into court and fined $3. Eighty-nine per cent, as I ascertained the last time I looked it up—89 per cent of the crimes of which the Greeks were convicted in the city of New York was simply the offense of standing more than five minutes on a street corner selling shoe laces and things of that sort without a license. Yet that gives a chance for gentlemen to rise in their places and call attention to the horrible statistics of crime among our foreign-born population.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. I am only taking the criminals that are confined in Sing Sing and Auburn, and criminals who are confined for a considerable length of time.

Mr. BURNETT. I will state that the police commissioner was not talking about those offenders. He was talking about prisoners confined in Sing Sing and in the State penitentiary for crimes of a serious nature.

Mr. BENNET. I have no objection to the statistics of the commissioner, but in respect to these alien criminals I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] and always have been. A thing that I have never understood is the tenderness of this House toward aliens who commit crimes. It seems to me that a man who comes here and enjoys the privilege of being here and repays our kindness by violating our laws, by committing an act involving moral turpitude, should at the expiration of his sentence be deported. This amendment proposes that after a man has been convicted twice he shall be deported. In other words, as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] said with a great deal of gravity, they found in the prisons of New York a great many men who had been convicted and who had served out their sentence and then had been let out and committed other crimes and been convicted again, and because the men had been convicted twice he thought that they should be deported. Because the man had been convicted twice he thought that man should be deported. Now, why should he not be deported after having been convicted once of a crime so grave as a felony?

This is no new attitude on my part, because seven or eight years ago I introduced a bill which was reported to this House. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] at that time made arguments similar to those made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] to-day. The bill came up under suspension of the rules and failed to secure a two-thirds vote, and I never could get it up for a vote after that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. SABATH) there were—ayes 53, noes 11.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SABATH: Strike out, on line 19, page 39, the word "five" and substitute therefor the word "three."

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, this will shorten the time from five years to three years. I believe that if a man has been in this country for three years and then, because of conditions over which he has no control, becomes a public charge he should not be deported.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, the committee were of the opinion that the time should be extended. The law now is three years. Certainly if people become public charges and inmates of our hospitals or poorhouses at public expense within five years it is not right that our people should have the care of them. I supposed it was the unanimous view of the committee that the time should be extended to five years, and I hope that the amendment will not prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, in line 25, page 39, to strike out the word "five" and substitute the word "three," so that the provision will read—

Any alien who is hereafter sentenced to imprisonment for a term of one year or more because of conviction in this country of a crime involving moral turpitude committed within three years after entering—

And so forth. A little while ago I offered and the committee adopted an amendment eliminating the time limit, showing that I had no sympathy with the man who is really a criminal at heart; but I believe we ought not to be so hard upon a man who at some time, without thinking and without really knowing it is an offense, does something which may be designated technically as a crime involving moral turpitude. In certain sections of the country the larceny of a few pennies or of a piece of coal or a loaf of bread is considered a crime involving moral turpitude. I do not think we should be too harsh on an unfortunate man of that kind. We may very likely have cases where a man has married within five years after his arrival in this country. He may have married an American woman and may have children. What will become of his wife and his children if he is deported? The danger is not so great if we change the limit to three years.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I suppose the gentleman realizes that the stealing of a few pennies or a loaf of bread by a negro hardly rises in importance to a felony, and he would not serve a year in the penitentiary for such an offense.

Mr. SABATH. We have cases of record where a man has broken into a chicken coop and stolen a chicken, has been charged with the crime of larceny, or even breaking and entering, and has been sentenced for a longer period than one year.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I want to say to my friend that I never knew of any man being sent to the penitentiary for stealing chickens except one, and that man stole some thoroughbred game birds.

Mr. SABATH. Oh, the darkies in the State of Texas have not a monopoly upon the stealing of chickens. There are others in his State who will sometimes take a game chicken.

Mr. MANN. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. MANN. Does not my colleague think that after all a large part of the objection that he makes is taken care of by the provision in the bill which forbids deportation if the judge who enters the sentence does not desire to have a man deported?

Mr. SABATH. In a measure it does, but I am a little alarmed at the way in which that provision is worded. Two years ago I attempted to perfect that proviso but did not succeed. However, we succeeded in securing this provision, which is better than nothing, though it does not go as far as we desired.

Mr. MANN. Take a case such as the gentleman has cited. Is it not almost certain that the judge would recommend that the man be not deported, and in that case he would not be deported?

Mr. SABATH. I agree with my colleague that in our State and in our city, where the judges are familiar with the conditions under which these immigrants live, a judge would perhaps recommend that the man be not deported; but there are certain parts of our country where there are judges who are prejudiced against immigrants, who will listen to no reason or appeal, and who will be only too pleased to order deportation whenever the opportunity presents itself. For that reason I believe that this amendment should be adopted and the time limit shortened.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I want only two minutes. The gentleman from Illinois has called attention to the provision that does not exist in the present law, and really that is the mitigation of the law as it stands. The law as it stands is three years. It must be a sentence of 12 months, and it must be for a crime involving moral turpitude, and the alien again is hedged about by the right of the judge to say that he shall not be deported and he will not be. I think it is in the interest of the alien; and I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 41, line 12, after the word "at," strike out the words "the time of" and insert the words "any time after."

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago my colleague from Illinois called the attention of the committee to the provision which gives the judge the right of recommendation as to whether or not a man so sentenced should be deported. The provision reads:

Provided further, That the provision of this section respecting the deportation of aliens convicted of a crime involving moral turpitude shall not apply to one who has been pardoned, nor shall such deportation be made or directed if the court sentencing such alien for such crime shall, at the time of imposing judgment or passing sentence, make a recommendation to the Secretary of Labor that such alien shall not be deported in pursuance of this act; nor shall any alien convicted as aforesaid be deported until after the termination of his imprisonment.

I am trying to perfect the amendment. I have had no chance to talk to the chairman of the committee about the amendment, but I am trying to give the court jurisdiction so that it can, at any time after imposing judgment, make a recommendation that the alien be not deported. I believe this is a fair amendment. Frequently during the trial of a case the judge may omit or forget to make a recommendation, and thereby the alien may be deprived of the provisions of this act and of the benefits which we are trying to give him.

Mr. BENNET. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Certainly.

Mr. BENNET. I want to ask the gentleman if all his amendment seeks to accomplish is to give the judge the right not only at the time of the sentence, but at any time before deportation, to obliterate the deportation for any good reason that may exist in his mind?

Mr. SABATH. That is all I contemplate. No one can object to it, because no judge would deliberately order that deportation be not made unless there was good reason for it.

Mr. HAYES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. HAYES. Does not the gentleman think that the amendment would subject the judges of the court to all sorts of pressure? It seems to me that the language of the bill is right, and that the decision ought to be made at the time of the trial.

Mr. SABATH. I can not agree with the gentleman from California, because these aliens have no influence, nor can they bring to bear any pressure upon a judge.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Does not my colleague think that the language would give the court jurisdiction for a period beyond which he would be required to serve in the penitentiary under sentence?

Mr. SABATH. No; I do not.

Mr. MADDEN. Any time after imposing judgment would mean any time during his lifetime.

Mr. SABATH. If there is no such recommendation, he would be deported, and the recommendation after that would be of no value. So if a recommendation is made at any time, it must be before deportation has taken place.

Mr. MADDEN. Then, he ought to be given authority to make a recommendation only for the time while the sentence lasts.

Mr. SABATH. If a recommendation is made, it must be made at once, or before deportation takes place. After a man has served his full term the recommendation would have to be made immediately or before the deportation took place.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. POWERS. Would you not get into this difficulty: For instance, a man is sentenced to the penitentiary for 21 years and serves his term out. In the meantime the judge that passed the sentence might no longer be judge of that court. The bench is occupied by other judges, who know nothing about the facts.

Mr. STAFFORD. He has ceased to be "the court."

Mr. POWERS. Another man has taken his place who knows nothing about the facts of the case and does not know what to recommend.

Mr. SABATH. In such a case, where there is a conviction for such a serious crime, the court would have jurisdiction at that time to recommend the deportation after the man has served his sentence.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman think the court should have the right prior to his imposing his sentence, or at the time of the sentence, and would it not accomplish his purpose by leaving the text as it stands and inserting the words "or at any time thereafter"?

Mr. SABATH. I believe my amendment will cover that, that he will pronounce the sentence, and the moment he is through with it he can make his recommendation or at any time thereafter.

Mr. POWERS. Would not the gentleman's amendment, if it is adopted, militate against the man you are trying to protect? The new judge might come in, and, of course, knowing nothing about the facts in the case, might refuse a recommendation against deportation.

Mr. SABATH. No; it could not be to the injury of such alien. It would be, if at all, to his advantage. I desire to be fair, and I make this amendment for the reasons that frequently, after the conviction, conditions arise that may lead a judge to make recommendations that the man should not be deported, whereas if he made the recommendation at the same time he might, in view of the conditions that existed then, recommend immediate deportation.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the amendment, and I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH]. I think that this particular amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], although I voted against his other amendments, which I think weaken the criminal-deportation section, ought to be adopted; but I would like to ask the two gentlemen if they do not think that what is desired to be accomplished would be better accomplished if they struck out, on line 12, the words "at the time of imposing judgment or passing sentence," so that it would read:

If the court sentencing such alien for such crime shall make a recommendation to the Secretary of Labor that such alien shall not be deported in pursuance of this act.

Then the court could make it at any time. He could make it in connection with the sentence, and sometimes the court would like to do that for the effect upon other people, or he could make it afterwards. I would say to the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] that I do not take much stock in this matter of pressure on courts. A man who is big enough to be elected a judge of a court that may sentence a man for a felony ought to be big enough to resist pressure.

Mr. HAYES. Is it not true that as soon as a man is sentenced the judge then ceases to be the court with respect to that particular man, and he has no jurisdiction over it? He would be subject to pressure, and people could call on him and induce him to take an action which as a judge of a court he could not be induced to take.

Mr. BENNET. Oh, his act would still be a judicial act, and if a man has not strong enough moral fiber to resist that sort of pressure, he ought not to be a judge. My belief about most of the judges of our country is that they are not improperly swayed by pressure, and I do believe that a judge has a right and ought to have a right under this somewhat severe provision to have all of the facts presented to him and act on the facts, just as a governor acts in relation to a pardon case. A judge sentencing a man for a felony may not know of the existence of this Federal statute. A man might come around in 48 hours afterwards and say, "This man that you have sentenced to two years in the penitentiary for felony will at the expiration of that time be deported," and the judge will say, "That is too bad; that ought not to be"; and then the reply would be, "Well, you have the right to stop that by recommendation"——

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. Is it not true that in all the States—it is in mine—a judge has control of his judgment until the expiration of the term of court?

Mr. BENNET. Yes; it is in New York.

Mr. BURNETT. That being the rule, would he not have the right in any event, up to the expiration of the term of court even, to make that order or to modify an order previously made?

Mr. BENNET. Not under this language, because it says that he shall make it at the time of imposing judgment or of passing sentence, and I call the attention of the gentleman from Alabama to the fact that we are imposing a duty on a State court judge, we are making him pro tanto, pro tempore, a Federal official. We are giving his acts possibly as an individual a Federal effect, and we have the right to limit, regardless of State laws, the time when he can exercise that act, just as in connection with naturalization we have the right to say to the judges of the State courts when they shall do a thing and when they shall not do it.

Mr. BURNETT. I see the danger the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] has stated, in the pressure upon the court. However, I do not think it would be a bad amendment to allow a judge to have during the term of court power to modify his decision if he desires to do so, but I do not think it ought to go beyond that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I think there are two reasons why the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] ought not to be adopted. I have had several years' experience in the prosecution of crimes in the State courts, and I know this, that after the facts have all gotten out of the mind of the judge, and several months have elapsed since the conviction of the criminal, a judge doing any volume of business can not possibly keep all of the facts and circumstances surrounding the trial of the man in his mind, and then the friends of a convicted felon, or of a person convicted of crime involving moral turpitude, get together. They petition the judge. He is human. He can not exactly place all of the facts and circumstances surrounding the sentence of this man and his trial and he is overpersuaded and signs the petition, and retains in this country a man who ought not to be retained. That is one objection.

The other objection is this, that if the judge should be removed, as suggested by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POWERS], by the expiration of his term of office, he would not have jurisdiction; but a judge who has had nothing to do with developing the facts or knew nothing about the facts, as I understand the section, would have the right to make such a recommendation to the Department of Labor. In all jurisdictions about which I know anything, until the expiration of the term of court the judge has it within his power, and it is entirely within his province, to change the term or to do anything he desires to do about the extent of punishment that he has imposed at that particular term of court.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Under this bill, is the deportation after sentence discretionary with the Secretary of Labor or obligatory upon him?

Mr. HOWARD. I think under the language that the only province of the judge is recommendation.

Mr. MANN. I say the Secretary. Supposing the judge has made no recommendation, under the terms of the bill is not the Secretary obliged to cause the deportation?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Suppose a man should be pardoned?

Mr. HOWARD. Well, I have known of men who were pardoned that ought not to have been pardoned.

Mr. MANN. I understand, and I have no doubt the gentleman has known governors to pardon men who ought to be pardoned.

Mr. HOWARD. The mere fact that they are pardoned does not make them morally fit.

Mr. MANN. But there are cases where the pardon is properly granted. There may be many cases where a parole is frequently granted. Now, ought not there to be some method——

Mr. BURNETT. If the gentleman will permit, that is provided for. I will call attention to it, in the proviso on page 41:

That the provision of this section respecting the deportation of aliens convicted of a crime involving moral turpitude shall not apply to one who has been pardoned.

Mr. MANN. I was giving that as an illustration, but circumstances may come where there is a reason for a parole. That is frequent everywhere, which shows that the sentence ought not to be carried into effect. Ought there not be some way by which that can be reached?

Mr. HOWARD. I think a man who is palpably guilty of a crime involving moral turpitude—that is, a penalty created as this bill provides—that upon the recommendation of the judge and the department that that man, if he commits this crime within a certain time after arriving in this country, ought to be deported as an undesirable citizen.

Mr. MANN. We all agree to that; that is not the question.

Mr. HOWARD. There is no contingency that can arise by which you can in the least minimize the crime if the truth was ascertained at the original trial.

Mr. MANN. There are a great many people convicted of a great many crimes unjustly, sometimes where the circumstances were not fully known. That often happens, as the gentleman knows.

Mr. HOWARD. That is possibly true in many cases.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I can not accept the opinion expressed by some gentlemen who have spoken as to the duty and right of the court in these matters. I appreciate, of course, what it means for me to differ from some of these gentlemen on questions of law, but I wish to express my opinion to the effect that after the offender has been convicted in the court, sentence imposed, commitment papers made out, and the offender taken to prison, the court ceases to have jurisdiction of the person or subject matter except to entertain a motion for a new trial or to permit necessary proceedings to be taken looking to appeal of the case to a higher court, or in some cases as provided by the statute of the State, to join in a petition to the executive authority for a pardon of the convict. I can not agree at all with the statement of gentlemen that during the term of court, it may be a long term of court, but during the term of court, regardless of what may have been the proceeding in that court respecting the trial and sentence of one charged and convicted of crime, even though he may have been taken to prison, that the court has jurisdiction of the case to the end of the term of court. I do not know the laws of all the States, and I may say I know very little of the laws of any of them, but I am not prepared to believe that in any State of this Union after proceedings have been taken, such as I have outlined, respecting a criminal case, that any court has jurisdiction to the close of the term.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the proper time and the only time when the court should be permitted to make a recommendation, which has authority and which shall have weight, should be at the time the case is tried by the court, and at the time the judge presiding over that court imposes judgment or renders his decision. I think that it would be unwise, unsafe, to invest that court with this authority after the case has been disposed of. If this amendment is adopted, a recommendation by a court or by a judge by or before whom the case was tried, made years and years after the trial, and even after the court or judge has lost jurisdiction, can be used for the purpose of preventing deportation. This law ought to provide, if recommendation is to be made and if it is to have weight, that it be made promptly and when the entire matter is fresh and not permitted after the lapse of years.

I suggest and I express the opinion that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois ought not to be adopted.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I fully agree with the statement of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN], but I want to amplify a little further on his thought. When the alien is before the judge charged with a crime and the time for sentence comes, necessarily the question of whether he shall be deported or not must be presented to the court, and when all the facts are before him, and after both sides have been heard by the court, that is the time when that important matter should be decided. After the decision has been rendered and judgment entered, and the case is practically out of court, it would be very unsafe to permit a judge to reverse himself in a matter of that kind, having heard only one side of the case. Necessarily in such a case the judge would hear only one side of the case. This would be very unsafe, and I am sure the gentleman from Illinois will agree with me that it would be an unheard of proceeding in judicial matters to permit a reversal of the judgment of the court in an important matter of that kind without giving an opportunity for a hearing of both sides of the question.

Mr. SABATH. If the gentleman will permit, there is nothing in my amendment that would not give the same right of hearing to both sides, and I think the gentleman will agree with me that we could take for granted that at the time the sentence is imposed all the facts and all the evidence in the matter is before such court. Frequently, the gentleman knows, and I know, new trials are granted. Why? Because new evidence has been adduced that could not have been secured at the time. Now, the gentleman would not think that if new evidence developed showing that a man has been unjustly sentenced the court should not have the right and jurisdiction to change its views?

Mr. HAYES. If the court had no such jurisdiction of the case, the judge still has the right to recommend executive pardon for the convict, just as he has in any other case, and a part of that pardon will, under the law, prevent the deportation.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment now close.

Mr. POWERS. Close in five minutes.

Mr. BURNETT. I yield to the gentleman two minutes. That will be enough.

Mr. POWERS. Make it five minutes, and I will stop when I get through.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] ought to prevail. It says, "that at any time after imposing judgment or passing sentence" the court can recommend against deportation. The bill as framed says at the time of imposing judgment or passing sentence the judge, if he makes a recommendation to the Secretary of Labor that the man should not be deported, he will not be. As has been urged here by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD], at the time the sentence is imposed by the judge or at the time he passes sentence upon the prisoner all the facts in the case are clear in his mind. They will not be if years should elapse. Both the Commonwealth and the defendant are represented in court at the time sentence is passed. There is nothing in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POWERS. I yield, sir.

Mr. SABATH. If there is nothing to the amendment, why does the gentleman oppose it?

Mr. POWERS. I did not get through with my sentence.

Mr. SABATH. I beg your pardon.

Mr. POWERS. I say there is nothing in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois which would require both the Commonwealth and the defendant to be represented at the time application was made to this judge for the purpose of securing his recommendation that the man should not be deported.

Mr. SABATH. If the gentleman will offer such an amendment, I am willing to agree to such an amendment to my amendment.

Mr. POWERS. I suggest that the gentleman figure that out while I am speaking.

And another thing, Mr. Chairman. As has been urged by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN], terms of court expire and courts no longer have jurisdiction of the particular case. I know that is the law in Kentucky. I do not know about the law in the other States. Kentucky law provides that after the term of court at which the judgment is rendered and sentence is passed, the courts have no further jurisdiction of that particular case. They have no jurisdiction to even recommend pardon as a court. The gentleman from Michigan suggested that they did have the power to recommend pardon. That is not true except in their individual capacity. They can do it as individuals. The Commonwealth attorney can do it as an individual, or the court can do it as an individual, but they have no right to recommend it even in their official capacities after the term of court has elapsed and passed at which the sentence was rendered.

Another thing, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois makes it impossible for the court to make this recommendation at all other times than that at which he would be best able to make it. If he would put in his amendment after the word "sentence" or "at any time thereafter," to make his amendment read like this, "at the time of imposing judgment or passing sentence or at any time thereafter," the amendment would be in a good deal better shape than it is now, because, as has been said, at the time the judgment is rendered and at the time the sentence is passed, the judge is best qualified to make these recommendations.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. SABATH. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 13, noes 58.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I have a committee amendment which I wish to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 40, line 20, following the semicolon, insert "any alien who was convicted or who admits the commission prior to entry of a felony or other crime or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude."

Mr. BURNETT. The purpose of that amendment is just simply to remove the time limit to felons who come here as felons and who were convicted on the other side. They have no right to enter, but many of them, as stated by the commissioner, slip in; and under the law now, the five-year limit, or the three-year limit under the present bill, would prevent a deportation of a man who committed murder or any other crime involving moral turpitude on the other side.

Now, we all believe, as I said a moment ago, that while the crime is committed on this side there ought to be some time limit. Yet a man has come in, perhaps, surreptitiously in violation of the law, and that excludes him as a criminal, and there ought to be no time limit as to his exclusion as a criminal.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 41, line 12, after the word "sentence," insert "or within 30 days thereafter."

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, by the insertion of the words "within 30 days thereafter" the section would read:

Nor shall such deportation be made or directed if the court sentencing such alien for such crime shall, at the time of imposing judgment or passing sentence, or within 30 days thereafter, make a recommendation to the Secretary of Labor that such alien shall not be deported in pursuance of this act.

Now, the reason why I have offered this amendment is because in the State of New York and elsewhere we find judges may make errors at the time of drawing the commitment papers or imposing sentences, and this amendment would give opportunity to the court or judge imposing sentence to rectify his error within 30 days after imposing such sentence or judgment.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIEGEL. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Very likely the courts of New York are in session all the time, but suppose the term of court had expired, would the gentleman permit the judge on his own responsibility, without a hearing, but merely as an ex parte matter, to make this recommendation?

Mr. SIEGEL. I would, and I would do it for this reason: I think the judge is only human. He is part of a court, and being on the bench and elected by the people, who have put him into power and placed him upon that bench, they have sufficient faith in him to leave it to him to rectify his errors according to his own conscience and according to his own best judgment. The American people respect their courts and the men they have elevated to the bench. I, for one, have the utmost confidence in our judges and trust them in every way.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIEGEL. I do.

Mr. POWERS. If the term of the court has expired, then the court, as such, would have no jurisdiction over the case. I suggest that on line 11 you put in the words "or judge" after the word "court."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. SIEGEL. I ask for a division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 28, noes 46.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last proviso after the word "thereof," beginning on line 23 of page 41.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: Strike out the proviso beginning on page 41, line 23, and ending on page 42, line 9.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the proviso which I have moved to strike out reads as follows:

Provided further, That any person who shall be arrested under the provisions of this section, on the ground that he has entered or been found in the United States in violation of any other law thereof which imposes on such person the burden of proving his right to enter or remain, and who shall fail to establish the existence of the right claimed, shall be deported to the place specified in such other law. In every case where any person is ordered deported from the United States under the provision of this act, or of any law or treaty now existing, the decision of the Secretary of Labor shall be final.

In the first place, that is an ambiguous proviso. In the second place, it admits of certain wrongs to aliens in the way of blackmail that ought to be prohibited. In the third place, in giving exclusive jurisdiction to the Secretary of Labor it conflicts with the Constitution, which preserves the right of habeas corpus.

There is no reason why Congress should make trouble for itself in passing a law or a provision of law which is unconstitutional, which it would seem to do in this instance if it provides that in a matter of human rights the Secretary of Labor shall have final judgment.

If we have a Secretary of Labor such as we had several years ago, who was generally regarded as being in favor of immigration, and if we have one now who is generally regarded as opposed to immigration, the evil of this discretion lodged in the Secretary will at once appear. If the Secretary is opposed to immigration, he may deport any one against whom charges are made. If he is in favor of immigration, he may admit anyone against whom charges are made. The right to go to a court, the constitutional right of habeas corpus, is denied by this provision.

It often happens, and it would happen particularly with respect to Chinese and Japanese, if this proviso is intended to relate to them, that gross injustice would be done to them. Whenever they locate in the United States and become prosperous it is mighty easy for some scheming or blackmailing person to harass them by demands for money. In the case of Chinamen it has been charged that they have been treated this way when they became prosperous enough to make good victims. With regard to other immigrants, in the Italian colony particularly, it frequently happens that a blackhander operates with great freedom. A man comes into the country, locates in business, marries, becomes moderately prosperous, and then some designing person, who himself may or may not have the right of citizenship, sends him a black-hand letter demanding a sum of money.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Is the gentleman of the opinion that the concluding paragraph of the proviso precludes an alien from resorting to the courts for the determination of his rights?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I certainly think that is the purport of the proviso. It so reads. It means that when a man is complained against, no matter what his offense may be, he must prove up in the last analysis to the Secretary of Labor only or leave the country. He is put wholly within the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Labor. He seems to have no right to appeal to the courts. As the matter stands two designing persons in a great city like New York, two gunmen, if you please, two blackhanders in the city of Philadelphia or any other city, may set up a job on some poor alien who does not know very much about our laws or the right of habeas corpus, and thus operate under this law to his injury. This sort of blackmail is apt to happen to the man who is industrious, who has been prosperous, and if he fails to pay or leave his pot of gold in a certain place at midnight, as it were, the complaint might prevail against him. It is easy, where men do not understand American customs and conditions, to set up a job of that kind. This paragraph should be satisfactorily explained or be stricken out. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make an inquiry or two of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT], if I can be recognized.

Mr. BURNETT. What is the request of the gentleman?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I desire to be recognized mainly that I may ask a question or two of the gentleman from Alabama in charge of the bill.

Mr. BURNETT. I will state to the gentleman that the first part of that paragraph relates to Chinese. It says—

Who are found in the United States in violation of any other law thereof which imposes on such persons the burden of proving his right to enter or remain.

The only other law is the Chinese-exclusion law. This is for the purpose of putting the burden on them, as to the last part of it. That has been the law ever since there has been an immigration law, that the decision of the Secretary of Labor shall be final. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] was a very distinguished member of the committee for years, and I never heard him find any fault with that provision until now.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I beg the gentleman's pardon. While I was a member of the committee I did contest the right of the Secretary of Labor to decide these cases without the right of appeal. I have always held to the right of appeal.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Does the gentleman from Alabama hold that this language deprives the alien of his right to appeal to the courts?

Mr. BURNETT. No. It does not in fact.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. However you frame the language, you could not cut off the right of the alien to appeal to the courts in the determination of his rights?

Mr. BURNETT. There is no doubt about that, and it is done. I move, Mr. Chairman, that all debate on this paragraph be now ended.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will first put the question on the amendment. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the proviso on page 41, beginning on line 3, the first proviso.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 41, by striking out the proviso beginning in line 3 and ending in line 7.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this proviso reads:

Provided, That, for the purposes of this act, the marriage to an American citizen of a female of the sexually immoral classes the exclusion or deportation of which is prescribed by this act shall not invest such female with United States citizenship.

I am quite in sympathy with the purposes of the proviso, but I do not understand how you can declare a person an American citizen for one purpose, and then declare that such person is not an American citizen for another purpose. The Constitution of the United States provides that—

The Congress shall have power * * * to establish an uniform rule of naturalization—

And then provides further that—

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States.

And there is no power in Congress to declare that a person is a citizen of the United States, but shall not be considered a citizen under some special provision of law. When one becomes a citizen of the United States, the United States under this law can not deport that person. Now, what is the use of putting into this act a provision that is clearly unconstitutional?

Mr. BURNETT. I do not quite get the idea of the gentleman. This provision reads:

Provided, That, for the purposes of this act, the marriage to an American citizen of a female of the sexually immoral classes the exclusion or deportation of which is prescribed by this act shall not invest such female with United States citizenship.

Mr. MANN. Why, certainly—

For the purposes of this act.

But the naturalization law provides that where an alien woman is married to an American citizen, that alien woman becomes an American citizen. Now, you can change that if you want to, I suppose, but you can not say that she is an American citizen for the purpose of inheritance, for the purpose of protection in other respects, but is not an American citizen "for the purposes of this act." She is or she is not. If she is an American citizen, as she is under the naturalization laws, you can not say that for the purposes of some other act she shall not be an American citizen, because that is denying a fact. The Constitution provides that we may pass uniform laws of naturalization; and when we say under those laws that a person becomes an American citizen, that person is an American citizen for all purposes.

If you want to modify the naturalization laws and provide that the marriage of such a person to an American citizen shall not constitute that person an American citizen, I think we have that power. We have no power to say that she is an American citizen, but is not for the purposes of a particular act. We can not do that. I do not think we ought to place in this act provisions which are clearly unconstitutional. We go a long way. I am in favor of going a long way. I would like to exclude this class of people entirely. I think it is wiser in the end to maintain the rights of American citizens, where they are constituted American citizens, than it is to deport some criminal. [Applause.]

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. HOWARD. As I understand this provision, it is intended to provide than an alien woman of the character set forth in the provision can not hide behind the citizenship of her husband by marrying an American citizen, when without that marriage the Government of the United States would have the right to deport her. Now for instance, take a moral pervert, a man who would marry such a woman, who would go into collusion with her. She is about to be deported on account of her character. She marries this man on the spur of the moment to prevent deportation. This section seeks to provide that that woman shall not by that marriage be vested with American citizenship.

Mr. MANN. Oh, not at all.

Mr. HOWARD. That is what I understand.

Mr. MANN. Not at all. It says "for the purposes of this act" she shall not be an American citizen; and if a person is an American citizen for one purpose, that person is an American citizen for all purposes, and Congress can not by statute provide otherwise.

Mr. BURNETT. Would it meet the gentleman's objection to strike out the words "for the purposes of this act"? Then it would read—

That the marriage to an American citizen of a female of the sexually immoral classes the exclusion or deportation of which is prescribed by this act shall not invest such female with United States citizenship.

Mr. MANN. I should think that would be a constitutional provision. How much it would interfere with the decisions of courts in reference to inheritance I do not know. It is quite important with reference to a great many laws to know whether a person is an American citizen or not, but I think that amendment would make the provision constitutional.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I see the force of the suggestion of the gentleman. Naturalization and citizenship, however, are entirely within the purview of the laws of Congress. As was suggested a moment ago, we decitizenize people who leave this country and are absent from it a certain length of time. The committee have no more desire than the gentleman from Illinois or any other gentleman has to enact an unconstitutional law, no matter how beneficial it may seem to be; and in order to meet the suggestion of the gentleman, I move to strike out of line 3, on page 41, the words "for the purposes of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. MANN. I have an amendment pending to strike out the proviso. Does the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky relate to that?

Mr. POWERS. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to strike out the proviso.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to strike out the proviso. As I understand the parliamentary situation, the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is to strike out the following language:

That the marriage to an American citizen of a female of the sexually immoral classes the exclusion or deportation of which is prescribed by this act shall not invest such female with United States citizenship.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the provision ought to be stricken out. I had it marked in the bill to strike out as it stood, and, while I think it has been made constitutional by the amendment, I do not think it has been made proper or humane. Is there no such thing as reform of a woman, or a man, either, for that matter? And, furthermore, what rights are going to be affected by this very broad language? Do not you see what you are doing? You are putting under the chance of blackmail every alien woman who hereafter marries an American citizen, although she may be chaste as the driven snow, because any man or any woman who has a grudge or prejudice, or simply desires money, can go to that woman and say: "We will bring in proof that you were, to any extent, immoral prior to your marriage; we will deprive you of your American citizenship; we will affect the rights of property; we will cast a doubt on the citizenship of you and your children."

There is absolutely no limit to the possibilities of this amendment. Now, the cases affected are few. As I remember, in the investigation by the immigration committee we were never able to find but two authentic cases where a known certain prostitute gained American citizenship by marriage to an American citizen; and for these few cases we purpose to cast a doubt on the citizenship of every alien woman that hereafter marries an American citizen. "De minibus non curat lex" is a good old legal maxim. By attempting to meet these rare cases we cast a doubt upon the citizenship of thousands. I sincerely hope that the motion of the gentleman from Illinois will prevail.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. BENNET. I do not object, Mr. Chairman; I will renew it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I renew it. I am perfectly willing to take the onus of it.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, if, as the gentleman says, it is a matter of infrequent occurrence, there would not be anything serious about it, but I am informed by the representatives of the department that it is a matter of frequent occurrence that whenever they go after a woman of that character the woman gets behind some pimp or procurer and he himself marries the woman or gets some one else to do it. It is a serious proposition, and I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from New York will not be adopted.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to perfect the section.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it an amendment to the pending amendment?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. It is an amendment to the paragraph to perfect the text.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to close debate on the proviso in five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Let the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan be reported first.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 41, line 7, after the word "citizenship," add the following: "if the marriage of such alien female shall be solemnized after her arrest or after the commission of the acts which make her liable to deportation under this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves that all debate be closed at the expiration of five minutes on this proviso.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I was impressed by the argument of the gentleman from Illinois to the effect that this proviso may be or is unconstitutional. I doubt very much myself if Congress can in an act of this kind provide that under certain circumstances citizenship shall not invest, whereas other laws provide that there shall be citizenship, with all rights pertaining thereto. I appreciate what the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] have said, that sometimes females take advantage of marriage to evade deportation, and it is a vicious practice. It seems to me that my amendment would meet that trouble. If the marriage is solemnized after the arrest, after the female is subject to arrest, or after she has committed acts or has been guilty of conduct making her liable to arrest and deportation, then her marriage shall not protect her, shall not invest her with citizenship. It seems to me that that will remove the objections raised and meet the situation entirely.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I think that is not a bad amendment.

Mr. BENNET. If it is adopted I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan will do what was in the minds of the committee, and I suggest that the gentleman from New York withdraw his amendment and ask that the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan be adopted.

Mr. BENNET. I will do it, with the additional suggestion that in lines 4 and 6 you strike out the word "female" and insert "woman." That is a matter of taste, but I think it is more modern.

Mr. MANN. But let me suggest to the gentleman that there has been a question as to the definition of the word "woman," whether it includes girl.

Mr. BENNET. I will not insist on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan to perfect the text.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk report the amendment that I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 41, line 11, after the word "court" insert the words "or judge thereof." And in line 12, page 41, after the word "sentence," insert the words "or within 30 days thereafter, due notice having first been given to a representative of the State."

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment seeks to give the judge a little more discretion in the matter and the prisoner a little more time. It has been contended here, and, I think, with a good deal of force, that after the term of court has passed at which the prisoner was sentenced the judge would not have any jurisdiction over his case. I think that is correct; but in putting after the word "court," in line 11, the words "or judge thereof," and after the word "sentenced" the words "or within 30 days thereafter, due notice having first been given to the representatives of the State," even though the term of court had passed, the judge of that court would have the power to make this recommendation, while the court itself would not have the power. The amendment, if adopted, would do this. Instead of compelling the court or the judge of the court at the time of imposing the sentence or of passing judgment to make his recommendation to the Secretary of Labor that said alien should not be deported it gives 30 days after passing judgment or imposing sentence in which to act on this proposition. I believe that things might arise within 30 days after the sentence has been passed that would completely change the mind of the court and make him aware within that time that he ought to make his recommendation when he would not know it immediately after passing sentence. The State, under my amendment, is to have due notice of the proposed action of the judge or court. I helped to frame and am heartily in favor of this bill, but I believe this amendment ought to pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BURNETT) there were—ayes 42, noes 27.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and desire the attention of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT]. On page 42, line 8, are the words "now existing." That does not seem to me very good legislation. If this Congress or a succeeding Congress amended the immigration law, or a new treaty was made, as new treaties are being made all of the time, then we would have this curious situation, that the decision of the Secretary under a treaty now existing would be legal, but a decision of the Secretary under a subsequent treaty or act would not be. I simply call the attention of the gentleman to that.

Mr. MANN. That clearly ought to go out.

Mr. BURNETT. What is the suggestion of the gentleman?

Mr. BENNET. If I were in charge of the bill, I think I would move to strike out the words "now existing."

Mr. BURNETT. There is no objection to that. It is merely carrying the language of the old law.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the words "now existing."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words for this purpose. The statement has been made repeatedly that this is existing law. The gentleman is in error about that. While it does not make any particular difference, we may as well have the question straight. The existing law is in section 25, and provides:

The decision of the appropriate immigration officer, if adverse to the admission of such alien, shall be final unless reversed on appeal to the Secretary of Labor.

It is about as broad as it is long, because the aliens always go up before a board of special inquiry; but in the case of Rosen, in which my colleague Mr. LONDON and I were interested as counsel, we brought that matter to the attention of the United States Court of Appeals in the second circuit, and we obtained a decision that neither the Secretary nor the board of special inquiry could make a decision except upon facts, and that the writ of habeas corpus has some efficacy left. It is an immaterial matter, but I thought I would straighten it out.

Mr. BURNETT. All of the courts, except the court to which the gentleman has referred, have held that it applies.

Mr. BENNET. Yes; but that is the latest decision. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 20. That the deportation of aliens provided for in this act shall, at the option of the Secretary of Labor, be to the country whence they came or to the foreign port at which such aliens embarked for the United States; or, if such embarkation was for foreign contiguous territory, to the foreign port at which they embarked for such territory; or, if such aliens entered foreign contiguous territory from the United States and later entered the United States, or if such aliens are held by the country from which they entered the United States not to be subjects or citizens of such country, and such country refuses to permit their reentry, or imposes any condition upon permitting reentry, then to the country of which such aliens are subjects or citizens, or to the country in which they resided prior to entering the country from which they entered the United States. If deportation proceedings are instituted at any time within five years after the entry of the alien, such deportation, including one-half of the entire cost of removal to the port of deportation, shall be at the expense of the contractor, procurer, or other person by whom the alien was unlawfully induced to enter the United States, or, if that can not be done, then the cost of removal to the port of deportation shall be at the expense of the appropriation for the enforcement of this act, and the deportation from such port shall be at the expense of the owner or owners of such vessels or transportation line by which such aliens respectively came, or, if that is not practicable, at the expense of the appropriation for the enforcement of this act. If deportation proceedings are instituted later than five years after the entry of the alien, or, if the deportation is made by reason of causes arising subsequent to entry, the cost thereof shall be payable from the appropriation for the enforcement of this act. A failure or refusal on the part of the masters, agents, owners, or consignees of vessels to comply with the order of the Secretary of Labor to take on board, guard safely, and transport to the destination specified any alien ordered to be deported under the provisions of this act shall be punished by the imposition of the penalties prescribed in section 18 of this act: Provided, That when in the opinion of the Secretary of Labor the mental or physical condition of such alien is such as to require personal care and attendance, the said Secretary shall when necessary employ a suitable person for that purpose, who shall accompany such alien to his or her final destination, and the expense incident to such service shall be defrayed in like manner. Pending the final disposal of the case of any alien so taken into custody, he may be released under a bond in the penalty of not less than $500 with security approved by the Secretary of Labor, conditioned that such alien shall be produced when required for a hearing or hearings in regard to the charge upon which he has been taken into custody, and for deportation if he shall be found to be unlawfully within the United States.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 44, line 3, strike out the words "like manner" and insert in lieu thereof the words "the same manner as the expense of deporting the accompanied alien is defrayed."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 24. That immigrant inspectors and other immigration officers, clerks, and employees shall hereafter be appointed and their compensation fixed and raised or decreased from time to time by the Secretary of Labor, upon the recommendation of the Commissioner General of Immigration and in accordance with the provisions of the civil-service act of January 16, 1883: Provided, That said Secretary, in the enforcement of that portion of this act which excludes contract laborers and induced and assisted immigrants, may employ, for such purposes and for detail upon additional service under this act when not so engaged, without reference to the provisions of the said civil-service act, or to the various acts relative to the compilation of the Official Register, such persons as he may deem advisable and from time to time fix, raise, or decrease their compensation. He may draw annually from the appropriation for the enforcement of this act $100,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended for the salaries and expenses of persons so employed and for expenses incident to such employment; and the accounting officers of the Treasury shall pass to the credit of the proper disbursing officer expenditures from said sum without itemized account whenever the Secretary of Labor certifies that an itemized account would not be for the best interests of the Government: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to alter the mode of appointing commissioners of immigration at the several ports of the United States as provided by the sundry civil appropriation act approved August 18, 1894, or the official status of such commissioners heretofore appointed.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Alabama to explain the proviso on page 46, commencing at line 15.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, that proviso reads as follows:

That if the person sending for wife or minor children is naturalized, a wife to whom married or a minor child born subsequent to such husband or father's naturalization shall be admitted without detention for treatment in hospital—

That is, they are not to be delayed; they are to come right in and go to the husband or father. The proviso continues:

and with respect to a wife to whom married or a minor child born prior to such husband or father's naturalization the provisions of this section shall be observed, even though such person is unable to pay the expense of treatment, in which case the expense shall be paid from the appropriation for the enforcement of this act.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. I yield.

Mr. MANN. Of course the purpose of this is to effect the first entrance of the wife or minor children into the United States.

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Suppose a naturalized citizen goes abroad with his family and comes home before his family does, which is not an unusual thing, I believe, and then sends for his wife and children, who have not only been naturalized but are citizens of the United States.

Mr. BURNETT. They are citizens in that case. The wife and children are citizens——

Mr. BENNET. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MANN. Whether they are citizens or not, this undertakes to govern their detention; and as we have the right to detain an American citizen who has a contagious disease, I take it that that is what the purpose of this is.

Mr. BURNETT. The purpose of that was to give to one who is a naturalized citizen before birth of his children or marriage of a wife an advantage over the wife or children of one who was married or born before naturalization.

Mr. MANN. This case might easily arise: A man comes over here from abroad and is naturalized; marries an American wife; raises some American children; goes abroad on a trip; comes home ahead of his wife and children, his wife and children to follow him. One of those children is found to have tuberculosis of some stage coming under the terms of this bill. That child would have to be put in a hospital and remain there possibly for the balance of its life, and a hospital over at Ellis Island.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Illinois is wrong. I think that the proviso is intended to do away with the severity of the prior provision.

Mr. MANN. I am not speaking of the proviso, I am speaking of the prior provision. Maybe the proviso does away with that part of it, but it would not if the child had been born prior to naturalization. Of course, a case of that sort may not arise often, but it may arise and is certain to arise at some time. Oh, if the gentleman will state that that is not the intention, I will be perfectly satisfied. I suppose the real purpose of this is, in the main, to give an entrance to the wife and child of the alien who has come over here first——

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And filed his declaration to become a citizen of the United States.

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And to give admission to the wife and children left behind when they come on, as they may in the course of a year; but, of course, it covers every conceivable case in language.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, if I have time, I desire to say I think the section now drafted is in the best form it has ever been in for the alien; that is, it has been humanized, and I am not criticizing the committee. I think this last proviso is all right and is a very excellent proviso, and I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 23. That the Commissioner General of Immigration shall perform all his duties under the direction of the Secretary of Labor. Under such direction he shall have charge of the administration of all laws relating to the immigration of aliens into the United States, and shall have the control, direction, and supervision of all officers, clerks, and employees appointed thereunder; he shall establish such rules and regulations, prescribe such forms of bond, reports, entries, and other papers, and shall issue from time to time such instructions, not inconsistent with law, as he shall deem best calculated for carrying out the provisions of this act and for protecting the United States and aliens migrating thereto from fraud and loss, and shall have authority to enter into contract for the support and relief of such aliens as may fall into distress or need public aid, and to remove to their native country, at any time within three years after entry, at the expense of the appropriations for the enforcement of this act, such as fall into distress or need public aid from causes arising subsequent to their entry and are desirous of being so removed; he shall prescribe rules for the entry and inspection of aliens along the borders of or coming to the United States from or through Canada and Mexico, so as not unnecessarily to delay, impede, or annoy persons in ordinary travel between the United States and said countries, and shall have power to enter into contracts with transportation lines for the said purpose; it shall be the duty of the Commissioner General of Immigration to detail officers of the Immigration Service from time to time as may be necessary, in his judgment, to secure information as to the number of aliens detained in the penal, reformatory, and charitable institutions (public and private) of the several States and Territories, the District of Columbia, and other territory of the United States, and to inform the officers of such institutions of the provisions of law in relation to the deportation of aliens who have become public charges. He may, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, whenever in his judgment such action may be necessary to accomplish the purposes of this act, detail immigration officers, and also surgeons of the United States Public Health Service employed under this act, for service in foreign countries. The duties of commissioners of immigration and other immigration officials in charge of districts, ports, or stations shall be of an administrative character, to be prescribed in detail by regulations prepared under the direction or with the approval of the Secretary of Labor: Provided, That no person, company, or transportation line engaged in carrying alien passengers for hire from Canada or Mexico to the United States, whether by land or water, shall be allowed to land any such passengers in the United States without providing suitable and approved landing stations, conveniently located, at the point or points of entry. The Commissioner General of Immigration is hereby authorized and empowered to prescribe the conditions, not inconsistent with law, under which the above-mentioned landing stations shall be deemed suitable within the meaning of this section. Any person, company, or transportation line landing an alien passenger in the United States without compliance with the requirement herein set forth shall be deemed to have violated section 8 of this act, and upon conviction shall be subject to the penalty therein prescribed: Provided further, That for the purpose of making effective the provisions of this section relating to the protection of aliens from fraud and loss, and also the provisions of section 30 of this act, relating to the distribution of aliens, the Secretary of Labor shall establish and maintain immigrant stations at such interior places as may be necessary, and, in the discretion of the said Secretary, aliens in transit from ports of landing to such interior stations shall be accompanied by immigrant inspectors: Provided further, That in prescribing rules and making contracts for the entry and inspection of aliens applying for admission from or through foreign contiguous territory, due care shall be exercised to avoid any discriminatory action in favor of foreign transportation companies transporting to such territory aliens destined to the United States, and all such transportation companies shall be required, as a condition precedent to the inspection or examination under such rules and contracts at the ports of such contiguous territory of aliens brought thereto by them, to submit to and comply with all the requirements of this act which would apply were they bringing such aliens directly to seaports of the United States, and, from and after the taking effect of this act, no alien applying for admission from foreign contiguous territory shall be permitted to enter the United States unless upon proving that he was brought to such territory by a transportation company which had submitted to and complied with all the requirements of this act, or that he entered such territory more than two years prior to the date of his application for admission to the United States.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 47, line 21, strike out the words "along the borders of or."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 50, line 13, after the word "entered," insert "or has resided in."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 47, line 7, after the word "thereunder," insert the words "he shall provide for the rotation of the clerical force so that each member shall have actual experience in work at a sea or harbor port."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment again reported?

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I have had this matter called to my attention, although I have had it in mind before, by the president of the Washington State Federation of Labor, in a letter addressed to the Secretary of Labor, and I read one paragraph, where he says:

At the time the Burnett bill was pending I suggested an amendment detailing to active field service for a period of years the bureau positions in Washington, D. C. I believe I would extend it to district headquarters of the service as well. My idea is that the men in the service ought to be brought into active contact with fieldwork that they might know from first-hand information the actual conditions that confront the service. I am free to say that I have learned more about the labor movement from actual contact with workingmen and working conditions, from being allowed an insight into their working lives, through spending 20 years of my life at a trade, than I ever learned from the printed page, and I am something of a reader at that. Orders in effect in the Army and Navy Departments covering compulsory field service seem to have good effect in that branch of Government service.

Now, the purpose of this amendment is to have the Secretary take these men who sit here in Washington city and make them go out and have some actual experience, have some field service; make them go to the seaboard or send them to the border ports, and there find out something instead of keeping them here in the bureau constantly. I think it would be a good thing for the service, and I hope the Secretary will see fit to do this. We have too much of the idea of a man getting in a bureau, staying there, and then dictating to the whole service when he has had no actual experience. I remember a little experience that occurred to myself. One time I wanted to get a commissioner of immigration at Seattle. I went down to talk to the bureau heads. They told me very frankly I could not have it; that they did not intend to have any commissioner of immigration at Seattle. I then went to talk to the Secretary and laid the matter before him, and he granted my request and a commissioner was appointed. I cite that to show the feeling in the bureau. They think they ought to control the whole immigration matter. If we can get some of these men who sit behind desks to go out to these different immigration stations, they will know more and it will be better for the service and better for them. I hope the committee will adopt my amendment.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Just what does the amendment propose. I have heard it read twice, but I do not now know.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Well, as near as the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Washington were able to put it in an amendment what we intended, after consultation, was to have these clerks in the office bureaus here in Washington City rotate and be sent out to these different stations, various seaports, and along the borders, so that they might have some actual experience as to how these affairs were managed.

Mr. MANN. What would they do at those places? Just look on?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Why, no; take the place of somebody already there and let somebody there be brought to Washington, so that the whole service may have the benefit of actual experience.

Mr. MANN. Would it just be to bring them here to do clerical work, or something else?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; it provides for the whole class of the service.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. If the amendment of the gentleman from Washington should be adopted you would not have any Department of Labor so far as the Immigration Service goes. You would have the men between the clouds and the earth, and nobody would know anything about what was going on in connection with the department at all. A man might be a first-class clerk and would not know anything at all about inspecting immigrants. He might be a first-class inspector and he would not know anything at all about office work. And the result of the amendment, if it was put into the law, would be to disorganize the department.

It is true they might be able by this means to get some man who is distasteful transferred from the point where he is to some other place, but I do not believe that any such thing as this ought to go into the law. If any business house was to undertake to move its men from its general office to its different plants and move the men from the plants to the general office, the concern would soon be in bankruptcy. And I apprehend it is just as important to run the business of the Government of the United States on a systematic basis as it is to run a private business on that basis. And if there is any way on earth that you could devise to disturb the system of the office having jurisdiction over immigration, this amendment discovers that way.

Of course, I realize that the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] are experts in drawing language, and know how to define the language they draw, and that their intentions are the best; but I would like to find somebody who could define this language who would agree that, after it was defined and put into the bill, it would not destroy the efficiency of the department or the bureau which has jurisdiction over this work.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] was illuminating, as he always is, but he spoke with a very conspicuous lack of knowledge. What he says can not be done is now in some instances being done, and this provision is simply to confer the benefits generally which are now being conferred partially.

I will give the gentleman an instance. There was an Assistant Commissioner General—I forget the exact title—Mr. F. H. Larned, one of the very best experts on immigration that there is, who was sent from the Washington office to New York and put in charge of the Division of Information. Now, take a good man like Mr. O'Donnell, one of the very best experts, and I think it would improve him if he should be sent to the port of New York, for instance, and exchanged for the time with Mr. Uhl, assistant commissioner, and I think it would improve Mr. Uhl if he could at the same time be sent down here to Washington and be given an insight into the way the other end of the proposition works. And so on throughout the different men of the bureau.

One of the growing troubles of our establishment is the lack of practical, thorough knowledge of the operations of the departments on the part of the men who have to operate them. And a man like Mr. O'Donnell, who knows a tremendous deal about immigration, would be a very much better man in the service if he could be given what I have suggested or could be sent out to Chicago to open that new inland immigration station——

Mr. MADDEN. That is open now.

Mr. BENNET. To be in charge of that new inland immigration station which was authorized through the efforts of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] sometime since. He would come back and know something about those things.

I think the American Federation of Labor is right in this matter, and the gentleman who wrote that letter was magnanimous enough to admit that he in his own business had found himself a better man for the service of his great organization by going back to the local and seeing how matters were conducted there. And that would be just the same way here. If these men from Washington, good men, got actual experience, it would help them, and if the men of the grade of Mr. Uhl could be sent to Washington and permitted to learn the environment here, that would be a good thing also. And I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] withdraw his pro forma amendment?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the last two words of the amendment should be stricken out, though I am not so sure that the amendment itself ought to go in. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York why these transfers are not now made if it is a wise thing to do? The department understands the need of it, I assume.

Mr. BENNET. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I am not in the confidence of the present Secretary of Labor. I do not know why he does not do a good many things that I think he might do, and I am not criticizing him. I simply point out the fact that he has done it; that he has exercised the power; that he has done what some of the gentlemen said could not be done, and done it in the case of a very conspicuous man. There are other cases. I can not remember the name of the man at present, but a gentleman was transferred from the Washington office to Los Angeles. I think I have answered the inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the desire of the gentleman from Washington to insert this amendment at the suggestion of the American Federation of Labor, for whose opinion I have great respect, yet all the legislation we have had in recent years—and there has been quite a lot of it—has been directed to prevent the departments in Washington loading up here with clerks and other employees in order that they may send them out into the field. That used to be a very common practice, namely, to come in and get an appropriation for the purpose of providing clerks and other employees in Washington in order to transfer them out to every place where they could not have gotten an appropriation to locate them. And all of the legislation in recent years has been toward preventing that thing being done. I question very much whether a clerk performing clerical work in Washington will learn anything more about his duty by going over to New York City. Doubtless he would have a better time sometimes. Perhaps he would enjoy the trip there. But remember—and the gentlemen seem to have forgotten it—that if he is authorized to be transferred to these places he is there temporarily on a salary, and subsistence in addition, and his traveling expenses paid besides. I have known cases in Washington in the old days where somebody employed here was assigned permanently, practically, to some office in New York or Philadelphia, and temporarily, theoretically, drawing a full salary and subsistence of $3 a day in addition all the time. That is what they would do under this amendment wherever they would go. People out there who would be brought here would be drawing salary and subsistence here; the people over here would be sent out there and would be drawing salary and subsistence there, and their traveling expenses, too, besides. For what? In order that somebody in Seattle might teach a clerk how to write, I suppose, or how to add up figures. That is what it would amount to. I appreciate the desire of the gentleman to confer knowledge upon these people, but the truth is it takes more than traveling around the country from one port to another to acquire the ability to do this class of work. People without some information to begin with never will make successful employees of the Government, and merely moving them from one place to another will not add very much to their sum of knowledge.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes in order to ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENNET. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama, who has means of acquiring information, to give me the answer to this question: Is Mr. Larned, who was transferred from the Washington office to New York City to take charge of the Division of Information, drawing subsistence at the rate of $3 a day or any other rate?

Mr. STAFFORD. Five dollars a day.

Mr. BURNETT. I understand he is not.

Mr. MANN. If he is permanently transferred, he is not.

Mr. BENNET. He is transferred to New York City and put in charge of the Division of Information. So it can be done, and all these dire and dreadful things that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has said would happen did not happen in that case.

Mr. MANN. A permanent transfer is under the existing law. These are temporary and moving. Under the law they would get subsistence in addition to their salary and traveling expenses.

Mr. BENNET. Oh, Mr. Chairman, once in my life, for seven months, I had the power to appoint people to office—six or seven people

Mr. MADDEN. And you did hesitate to do it?

Mr. BENNET. Yes, I did it; and I had the power, in connection with other gentlemen, to make transfers. We made permanent transfers. Sometimes they lasted as long as a week, and then we would make a permanent transfer back. There is no difficulty in making a permanent transfer under the civil-service law. That is the civil-service law to-day. You put in a proposition to make a transfer. A person is transferred, and 24 hours after that you can make another transfer and transfer him back.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman will concede that it is quite a different thing to transfer an expert from one place to another from what it is to transfer a whole force, regardless of whether they have any knowledge of the situation or not.

Mr. BENNET. This does not contemplate that.

Mr. MADDEN. It contemplates transferring everybody.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I can not think that the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] is serious in offering this amendment. If this amendment is adopted there is no reason why other clerks in other departments could not be shifted around from time to time.

The gentleman a few days ago refused to increase the number of hours of work for clerks to eight hours. This transfer is not applied to anyone else. It is presumed that the heads of these departments will put the proper men in the proper places, and if they undertake to do something of this kind and have a man unfit to perform his duties at Seattle, we will say, under the law, and in the discretion of the Secretary of Labor, the Superintendent of Immigration may remedy that situation. The man may be well qualified for some other position. I do not think that the gentleman is seriously contending for such a thing.

Mr. Chairman, I ask that all debate close on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that debate on this amendment be closed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT]. I observe on page 48, where there is an outline of the duties and the powers of the Commissioner of Immigration, the language is as follows:

> He may, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, whenever in his judgment such action may be necessary to accomplish the purposes of this act, detail immigration officers, and also surgeons of the United States Public Health Service employed under this act for service in foreign countries.

Does the act contemplate that certain surgeons who rightfully belong to the Public Health Service, under the Treasury Department, are to be assigned by that department to the Immigration Service, and who will then be detailed in foreign countries?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That being true, is their supervision and control then vested entirely in the Department of Labor, and are they no longer connected with the Treasury Department?

Mr. BURNETT. I did not catch the question. This is the present law; it is the existing law; and has been the law for quite awhile. They never availed themselves of that. However, they have been detailed. There is a surgeon now at Naples who has been detailed there without opposition from that country. But we can not do that where there is opposition. At Naples and other places where there is no opposition we have American doctors detailed.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Here is about the way it reads: "He may * * * detail * * * surgeons of the United States Public Health Service employed under this act for service in foreign countries."

What I want to know is this: Can he take them out of the Treasury Department here, where they now are, and send them to foreign countries for service, or does he take surgeons who have been heretofore transferred from the Treasury Department and detail them from The Hague to Rome and Naples and other places?

Mr. BURNETT. The language, I confess, is somewhat obscure, but as a matter of practice they detail their own experienced surgeons.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The reason why I make the inquiry is this: These surgeons are under the Secretary of the Treasury——

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Now, if they are going to be transferred to some other service, there must be some direction to the head of some department to transfer them.

Mr. BURNETT. Of course, there could be no detail, except with the consent of the Treasury Department.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Then I was going to inquire who made the selections of the people to be detailed. I will say to the gentleman that in my own district there are two places that receive most of the immigrants. One is on the Canadian border, where the transcontinental lines cross from Canada to Minnesota. The other is at the city of Duluth, where the steamboat lines coming from the Canadian ports bring down the immigrants. There are commissioners of the Public Health Service at both places making the proper inspection. Now, I have never been able to find out just how those men are employed, and under whose direction they are. They appear to be under direction of the Chief of the Public Health Service. If it is the purpose of this bill that these men shall inspect these immigrants, and that the Secretary of Labor can send them to Winnipeg or Quebec, I would like to know it.

Then there is another and an additional thing that I want to inquire about. There are differences about the compensation of these men. Their compensation is not uniform. In fact, the compensation is in most cases grossly inadequate.

Mr. BURNETT. As I understand it, the Treasury Department fixes the compensation. That is the department by which they are employed. Now, with the consent of that department, they are detailed by the Secretary of Labor and directed as to how to carry out their duties and are controlled by the Secretary of Labor in the administration of the law. He is the administrative officer.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Does the gentleman think that this language will enable the Secretary of Labor to detail anybody he wants, against the wishes of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. BURNETT. I should not think so.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I do not think so, either.

Mr. BURNETT. I should not think so, at all. I will say to the gentleman that it ought not to be so.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Does not the gentleman think that language ought to be more specific, outlining the circumstances and conditions under which these men can be detailed?

Mr. BURNETT. I understand the gentleman to suggest the words "with the consent of the Secretary of the Treasury," or something of that kind. This has been the law for many years. There is a gentleman sitting by me who has been connected with the bureau for a long time, a great many more years than the Commissioner General or the Secretary of Labor, and he informs me that there never has been any trouble about it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Of course there has never been any trouble in the way of conflicts between the two departments, perhaps, but there certainly has been a great deal of uncertainty about their employment.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. FESS. As I understand, the gentleman thinks we ought to have the permission of the Secretary of the Treasury to take the party from his department. Why not put it that way, that he may, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor and the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. BURNETT. My answer to that is that it would give it no more force or effect than it now has. He could not do it without the consent of the Secretary of the Treasury, anyhow; and if that is so, why put in something that does not give him any more power than he now has?

Mr. FESS. If that be true, then it would be unnecessary.

Mr. BURNETT. I think so.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I move to strike out the last word. The other day I understood the chairman of the committee to say that he thought the language on page 49 took care of the situation with reference to the contract that this Government has with the Canadian Pacific Railway in reference to the handling of Chinese. Now, I have another of those famous orders in council which I wish to read to the committee:

From and after the date hereof the landing in Canada shall be, and the same is hereby, prohibited of any immigrant who has come to Canada otherwise than by a continuous journey from the country of which he is a native or a naturalized citizen and upon a through ticket purchased in that country or prepaid in Canada.

That is in substantiation of what I said the other day, that while the Chinese coming to the United States under this order in council come through Canada and under an agreement that this country has with the Canadian Pacific Railway most of them come that way, yet a Chinaman can not come to Seattle and from Seattle go up to Vancouver. I have in my hand a copy of that agreement of the United States entered into with the Canadian Pacific Railway. I want to repeat what I said the other day, that I think it is a disgrace to this Nation that the United States has to go into partnership with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and in return for that partnership agreement the Canadian Pacific Railway gets this Chinese traffic. Practically all of the Chinese who enter this country to-day coming into the Northwest are carried over the Canadian Pacific Railway. Not only that, but if a Chinaman is on his way to eastern Mexico or to the West Indies he comes through Vancouver and is carried by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and in consideration for this favor the Canadian Pacific Railway furnishes offices for the force of the American Immigration Service. I called attention to this yesterday. As a part of this agreement—which I look upon as absolutely discreditable to the United States—the whole Pacific coast service is placed under the Montreal office, across the continent. Not only that, but the Montreal office is now trying to get all of Alaska under its control, and, largely, the purpose of all of it is to benefit the Canadian Pacific Railway. In reading reports of the evidence taken a few days ago before a commission from the Immigration Department to investigate this subject I have been surprised to find that Mr. Clark, the immigration commissioner up at Montreal, appeared before that commission and made an argument in favor of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I do not believe you are going to have the kind of service you ought to have on that border until you get rid of Mr. Clark.

Mr. BENNET. Will the gentleman yield for an inquiry?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. BENNET. Did I understand the gentleman correctly to say that an official of the United States Government appeared before the commission and advocated something desired by a railway company owned in a foreign country?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If I had the time I would read it. I have it here on my desk.

Mr. BENNET. I think the gentleman ought to take the time.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Clark went on to argue in favor of this agreement made between the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway. It has been charged a good many times within the last few years that Mr. Clark was not representing the United States but the Canadian Pacific Railway. I never believed there was very much in that statement, but since reading this evidence I think it at least ought to be called to the attention of the Commissioner of Immigration.

The reason I have not offered an amendment to take care of this situation is this: The department has the authority under existing law to change this condition without any amendment. The Commissioner of Immigration has been investigating this subject. He has not yet made his report, and I do not want to anticipate that report by offering any amendment here upon the floor of the House to compel him to do something that I hope and trust he will do anyway. But that condition that exists in Seattle and Vancouver on the Pacific coast has reached such a point that unless the Commissioner of Immigration and the department do take some action by the time we have another opportunity I am going to present to this House resolutions to investigate and see what is the reason why this country has to stay in partnership with a foreign railway and have them furnish us a place to conduct the business of the United States.

Mr. BENNET. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. BENNET. Is this Mr. Clark the same official of our Government who issued an order that an American citizen enlisting in the British Army did not thereby forfeit his American citizenship?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I presume so, because that would be characteristic of him. If there was anything un-American that he could do, he would probably do it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, there has been a good deal of criticism of Mr. Clark or somebody else for making the statement that an American citizen enlisting in a foreign army did not forfeit his American citizenship, and I have wondered many times whether the same critic would criticize Lafayette and many other volunteers who enlisted in the Army of the United States or its predecessor. I have wondered many times whether the Canadians who came over the border during the Civil War and enlisted in the Army of the United States were, in the opinion of these gentlemen, without any citizenship after they had enlisted. They did not become American citizens, but some of these critics say they had lost their Canadian citizenship and were people, because of their patriotism or enthusiasm, without a country. I think if Mr. Clark made the statement that an American citizen did not lose his citizenship because he enlisted in a war abroad, he made a correct statement. I hope that the time will never come in this country when, if we are engaged in war and some aliens in our own land who have not yet become American citizens want to go out and help fight our battles, that we will say that they are men without a country and without citizenship; that we have not made them American citizens, and they have lost their citizenship at home.

I do not know Mr. Clark, but, so far as that opinion goes, I am inclined to think he was steering on the right course, notwithstanding the criticism that has been leveled at the department on that subject.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. The gentleman is familiar with the fact that men who enlisted and served on the side of the Union during the Civil War were preferred and had certain privileges when they applied for citizenship.

Mr. GORDON. That naturalized them.

Mr. MANN. No; it did not naturalize them.

Mr. GORDON. That was the sole ground.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. They were entitled to certain privileges?

Mr. MANN. I say that we encouraged it; we encouraged them, and anybody with good sense would encourage help when they needed it.

Mr. GORDON. Is it not a fact that proof of enlistment in the Union Army during the Civil War was proof sufficient to dispense with the original declaration of intention to become an American citizen?

Mr. MANN. I think very likely. We desired to make them American citizens. What I am saying is that we did not desire merely because they enlisted to leave them without any citizenship, but on the contrary, when they did file papers, they were compelled to renounce their citizenship abroad on the theory that they held it up to that time.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. FESS. If my memory serves me, service in the war for one year on land was all that was necessary, instead of five years, and at sea in the Navy two years instead of five years.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Yes; but it was still necessary for the alien to apply to the court and prove his service and it was accepted as sufficient.

Mr. MANN. We gave them every encouragement we could, of course, very properly. I am not saying this because I think American citizens ought now to engage in a foreign war. I think we ought to keep out of it on both sides, not only by soldiers but in every other way. I do not think that we can take the position that a man loses his American citizenship and at the same time claim that if you enlist on our side you still retain the foreign citizenship.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Up to the 2d of March, 1907, the law of our country was precisely along the line stated by the gentleman from Illinois. We recognized the right of an American citizen to go abroad and enlist in a foreign army and come back and remain an American citizen. There are at least two decisions of courts to that effect. On the 2d of March, 1907, this Congress passed an act in reference to expatriation, one of the provisions of which was that an American citizen should be deemed to have expatriated himself when he has taken an oath of allegiance to any foreign State.

Under the Canadian enlistment law, which is the British enlistment law, a man enlisting in the British Army takes the oath of allegiance to Great Britain. On, I think, the 6th of December, 1914, the Department of State, which has the right, it seems to me, in the first instance at least, to construe our statutes in relation to citizenship, issued a circular to which I have inserted a reference in the RECORD on the 17th of March, in which they advised American citizens that while they had a right to expatriate themselves that if they took an oath of allegiance to a foreign Government when enlisting in a foreign army they did expatriate themselves. What I object to in Mr. Clark is that, in the first place, the Department of Labor is not the proper department of the Government to issue decisions in relation to citizenship. That is one of the duties of the Department of State.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Is not Mr. Clark called upon officially to determine a man's citizenship in a case of immigration?

Mr. BENNET. Yes; but that was not the case.

Mr. GORDON. That was how the case arose.

Mr. BENNET. The case arose by a man who attempted to come in at Detroit. That presents my second ground of objection. The commissioner of immigration in Canada ought not to have presumed to pass on a question of citizenship but should have referred it to the Department of Labor at Washington. I will say to the gentleman that subsequently the matter was referred to the Department of Labor, and the Department of Labor has substantially ruled both ways on the question, one of the rulings being in a letter to my colleague, Mr. PATTEN. We have the condition of the Department of State holding in an official proclamation that a man when he took the oath of allegiance expatriated himself and the Department of Labor holding precisely the opposite.

I have taken the matter up myself with the Solicitor of the Department of Labor, and he has admitted to me——

Mr. GORDON. It is a question of law, is it not, purely?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Under this supposed decision of the State Department, of what country is the man a citizen?

Mr. BENNET. Our State Department is not called upon to pass any further on the matter than that he has expatriated himself as a citizen of our country under the act which we passed.

Mr. MANN. We have passed upon the question that the mere taking of the oath of allegiance in the United States does not make a man a citizen here. Take the Indian depredation cases, where a man held office here and must have taken the oath a great many times. He was still an alien although he thought he was a citizen all of his life.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section conclude in two minutes, to be occupied by the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MILLER of Pennsylvania. Would it be in order to ask unanimous consent that this committee remain in continuous session until this bill is reported and all amendments thereto are disposed of?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it would at the appropriate time. It could not be done now, because the gentleman from New York has the floor.

Mr. MILLER of Pennsylvania. Then, after he is through the Chair will recognize me?

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, replying to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], I want to say that when this act of 1907 was before the House I called the attention of the House to precisely the condition which I said would arise. I was overruled by the House, subsequently overruled by the Attorney General, and now the Department of Labor is proceeding in precise accordance with what I then prophesied would be the condition.

Mr. GORDON. And that was a Republican administration that passed that law in 1907, was it not?

Mr. BENNET. Oh, of course. That is history.

Mr. GORDON. But the gentleman was just complaining here that this difference of opinion resulted because there was a Democratic administration in power.

Mr. BENNET. I made that complaint, and made it correctly.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. FESS. There is such a situation in which a man would not be a citizen of any country, is there not?

Mr. BENNET. I imagine so.

Mr. FESS. When a foreigner makes his application and renounces his allegiance to a foreign country, when does he cease to be a citizen of the foreign country?

Mr. BENNET. I do not know, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. Is there such an interregnum between the time he ceases to be a citizen of one country and becomes a citizen of another?

Mr. BENNET. We passed an act in the Sixty-second Congress to confer American citizenship upon a man named Smith, who, so far as we could find out, had no citizenship anywhere.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 22. That whenever an alien shall have been naturalized or shall have taken up his permanent residence in this country and shall have filed his declaration of intention to become a citizen, and thereafter shall send for his wife or minor children to join him, and said wife or any of said minor children shall be found to be affected with any contagious disorder, such wife or minor children shall be held, under such regulations as the Secretary of Labor shall prescribe, until it shall be determined whether the disorder will be easily curable or whether they can be permitted to land without danger to other persons; and they shall not be either admitted or deported until such facts have been ascertained; and if it shall be determined that the disorder is easily curable and the husband or father or other responsible person is willing to bear the expense of the treatment, they may be accorded treatment in hospital until cured and then be admitted, or if it shall be determined that they can be permitted to land without danger to other persons, they may, if otherwise admissible, thereupon be admitted: Provided, That if the person sending for wife or minor children is naturalized, a wife to whom married or a minor child born subsequent to such husband or father's naturalization shall be admitted without detention for treatment in hospital, and with respect to a wife to whom married or a minor child born prior to such husband or father's naturalization the provisions of this section shall be observed, even though such person is unable to pay the expense of treatment, in which case the expense shall be paid from the appropriation for the enforcement of this act.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following two amendments which I send to the desk and ask to have read, and I ask unanimous consent that they may be read and considered together.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, that will be done.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 51, line 7, after the word "act," strike out "$100,000" and insert "$200,000."

Page 51, line 10, after the word "employment," insert "and to purchase a launch suitable for such purpose, to be used by the Department of Labor on Puget Sound in the enforcement of the immigration laws."

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the last amendment. I will reserve it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman to reserve it, although I do not believe it is subject to a point of order. I desire to refer once more to the letter written by E. P. Marsh, president of the Washington State Federation of Labor, to the Secretary of Labor on November 5 last. I make no apology for referring to this letter so often, because it treats more fully this question of immigration in relation to our State than any document I have seen. Mr. Marsh has given a great deal of attention to the question of immigration, and especially to immigration coming in from British Columbia, the entering of Chinese into the Puget Sound country. On page 10 of the letter he says:

One or two fast launches are absolutely necessary to patrol Puget Sound waters. At present the only method used is to place inspectors on the boats running on regular schedules, good as far as it goes, but not greatly disturbing the peace of mind of the men profitably engaged in smuggling.

Mr. Chairman, as I recall, there were something like 200 Chinese last year who were arrested and deported, who were taken by these men and placed along the borders. How many came down by water no one can tell. Puget Sound is a body of water about 150 miles long. It is filled with a great many islands and it is an ideal place for smuggling, and the Department of Labor has no vessel at its command to use in that body of water and I offer this amendment for the purpose of calling that situation to the attention of the chairman of the committee. If I may say further, to show something of the magnitude of the problem we have to deal with out there, it is estimated that there are 30,000 Chinese in Canada, a great many of them in British Columbia, and I am not sure but what there are some 30,000 in British Columbia. During the years 1912 and 1913, 7,078 Chinese came into Canada and during the last year over 5,000.

It shows the problem we have to deal with out there, and they come into this country literally by the hundreds, and the department ought to be furnished with a suitable launch in order that they might effectively make its patrol, and when the Federation of Labor of my State protests against this and points out this evil after full investigation I feel fully justified in offering this amendment and urging it upon the attention of the committee, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, there is no point made against the increased appropriation from $100,000 to $200,000, but I desire to oppose that. The gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Washington do not agree there, because my friend from New York told me he wanted it decreased to $50,000. Now, there is a great amount of work for them; there is no doubt about that; and, as has been said by the gentleman from Washington, there is an immense amount of smuggling going on across the line, but the department is not asking for more money than $100,000. So far as that is concerned, there is a decrease in immigration to some extent. There is no doubt that there has been this last year a tremendous speeding up in the efforts of these fellows to smuggle Chinese and other undesirables across the border; but, at the same time, the Commissioner General and the Secretary of Labor say, with $100,000 appropriated for that purpose, they can get along with it. Now, as to the other point: The point of order I make is directed to the purchase of a launch suitable for such purposes, to be used by the Department of Labor on Puget Sound in the enforcement of the immigration laws. I think, Mr. Chairman, that is not germane to this bill or to this section, and, even if it were, I will not discuss the merits only to say that it is a matter of administration with which Congress certainly ought not to interfere. I make the point of order, however.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] is in harmony with the bill, as well as the Chair can apprehend, and the point of order is overruled.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I only desire to reiterate what I said—that this is an administrative feature. I have no doubt that the Secretary of Labor would be very glad if we could legislate him a launch; but I am not in favor of those things unless we know they are needed, and I am willing to leave with the Secretary of Labor the determination of the question whether it is needed or not. I ask for a vote.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman withhold that for a moment?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that no matter how much we might favor the granting of launches to patrol Puget Sound, I think we all agree that there should not be a duplication of service. This work, so far as the prevention of smuggling is concerned, comes directly within the purview of the Coast Guard Service. In fact, there is a bill pending on the calendar of the House to-day, providing for the construction of motor boats for the very purpose which is the design of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington. There is no need for the Department of Labor to use a launch for merely patrolling and keeping out Chinese when there is another department authorized by law to perform that service—the Coast Guard Service, formerly the Revenue-Cutter Service—having the same character of patrol, and where they have a broader and more general purpose, not only to keep out smuggled imports but also the enforcement of the immigration laws. So I take it that it will be merely a waste of funds. We all know the desire of the respective bureaus to amplify their work, and we all agree that the work should be centered in one department, and in this particular instance it is the Treasury Department under the Coast Guard Service. I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington will be defeated for that very reason, because there is provision made, or proposed to be made, for the Coast Guard Service to undertake this character of service.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Washington desire his amendments to be voted on together?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If the last one is voted down, I have no desire to increase the amount.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The question was taken, and the amendments were rejected.

Mr. MILLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I desire now to request that this committee remain in continuous session until the reading of the bill is concluded and all amendments are disposed of.

Mr. BURNETT. The gentleman need not make that request, for that is going to be done.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. MILLER of Pennsylvania. Another parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MILLER of Pennsylvania. Would it be in order for me to make that request every 15 minutes, because I intend to do it if it is in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can make it, and the Chair will rule on it when it is made.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I do not feel justified in taking up a great deal more time in the discussion of this bill. I have always heretofore favored this bill, and I hope that this time, if the President vetoes it, it will be passed in spite of that fact, and I am one man who stands ready to so vote.

It may be that the literacy test will not accomplish all that some of its friends claim for it, but it will do something. I think that this is a critical time in the history of this country. When the war in Europe closes there will be greater necessity, in my judgment, than ever before for the restriction of immigration. This bill will, in some degree at least, help to protect our country, and especially will it help to maintain the standard of wages and the standard of living that we have in America.

Of course, I think it of vital importance that this legislation be supplemented by tariff legislation to protect American labor. Unrestricted immigration is little worse for the laboring classes of this country than unrestricted importation. To bring foreign cheap labor into this country is not more destructive to our wage system and to the standard of living of the American workingman than is the unrestricted admission into this country of the products of foreign cheap labor. I do not believe the American people will be satisfied until we have accompanied this legislation with a protective-tariff measure. Unless we do this, as soon as the great conflict in Europe closes this country will be flooded with foreign-made goods as it has never been before. It is unnecessary to argue to any reasonable mind that if we buy goods from abroad that it means that much work and that much wages taken from the wage earner at home.

I regret that this bill was not amended so as to compel all aliens coming into the United States by water to enter at a seaport of the United States, and especially would I like to have seen the amendment which I offered adopted that provided that no alien should be admitted to the United States who has entered Canada by a Pacific coast seaport, except at a seaport of the United States. When this amendment was offered it was argued that other provisions in the bill took care of this situation. I am satisfied that this is a mistake. It is true that the department has the power to prescribe the ports of entry, and especially for the Chinese, but while they possess this power it has been impossible to get them to exercise it. For several years, in spite of all protests, our Government has been in partnership with the Canadian Pacific Railroad. The railroad has furnished offices for the immigration inspectors of this country. I look upon such arrangements as distinctly discreditable to this Nation. Of course, in doing this the Canadian Pacific Railroad expects to get its reward, and it does. As a result, it receives the Chinese traffic. I am not especially representing any railroad interest, but, as I have heretofore stated, I do not hesitate to favor an American railroad as against a foreign railroad.

But the Chinese question is not the largest one involved in this proposition. When the war in Europe closes there will probably be a heavy immigration to the Pacific coast through the Panama Canal. Under present conditions these immigrants to the Pacific Northwest will be landed at Vancouver, British Columbia. All the money expended in relation to their examination and detention will be spent in Vancouver instead of in an American city. All advantages will be given to the Canadian Pacific Railroad instead of to an American railroad. The Canadian land agent and promoter will be given the first opportunity to meet these immigrants. They will have the chance to get the cream of this immigration, and those that they can not persuade to remain in Canada and those they do not want will then come into our country. Why this discrimination? Why should not this country favor its own people, as Canada always does? Why should not these foreign steamship companies be compelled to land these immigrants at some port on Puget Sound instead of going to Vancouver? Why is it that this Government must constantly discriminate against its own steamship lines, its own railroad lines, and its own working classes in favor of those in Canada? I submit that I have watched with a great deal of impatience legislation for the past five years with reference to the Pacific Northwest, for I have seen practically every act that has gone upon our statute books discriminate not in favor of the United States but in favor of Canada.

While it may be that the department has power to stop this discrimination, they have shown no desire to do so, and for this reason I think that it was a mistake that the committee refused to adopt my amendment that would have compelled them to take such action.

Now, another thing that is radically wrong. The Vancouver office is under the control of the Montreal office. There is no justification for such action. It is all part of the Canadian Pacific influence that causes this to be done. There can be no good reason why Vancouver should be under the control of the Montreal office, more than 3,000 miles away, instead of under the Seattle office, only a hundred miles away. This situation has become so aggravated and is so unjustified that were it not for the fact that the department is now investigating the question I would introduce a resolution at once calling for an investigation as to why this situation is permitted to continue. Unless the department by the next session of Congress takes some steps to make this change, I shall proceed to ask for an investigation, to see if the truth can not be ascertained as to why this is done. I am satisfied that this situation is largely because of the attitude of the commissioner of immigration at Montreal, Mr. Clark. I very much fear that Mr. Clark is more favorable to the interests of the Canadian Pacific Railroad than to the interests of his own country.

As a result of the conditions which I have described, a great many Chinese have been coming into the State of Washington from British Columbia that ought not to come. That State has been flooded recently by labor from British Columbia and once in Washington, they have not been permitted to return. I have already called the committee's attention to an order that was issued in council by the Government at Ottawa on the 30th of September, 1915, which contained a provision to the effect that labor, skilled or unskilled, was prohibited from entering British Columbia. I brought to the attention of the committee a case where a young man from Seattle had been working for the Ford Motor Co. in British Columbia for several months. He was a skilled workman. He visited his home in Seattle, and when he attempted to return was, under this order to which I have referred, excluded, and the British Columbia officer stated that if he had not gone home he would have been deported. I am glad to say that upon the presentation of these facts the committee accepted my amendment, which read as follows:

That whenever any foreign country contiguous to the United States shall by statute, Executive order, or otherwise, exclude from its territory any class or classes of citizens of the United States upon grounds different from the grounds for excluding aliens from the United States herein specified, the same class or classes of aliens residing in such contiguous country shall be excluded from the United States so long as such exclusion of United States citizens continues.

This will do a great deal to protect the State of Washington from this labor coming in from British Columbia. I am pleased that at last the American Congress has had the courage and the good judgment to resent this constant discrimination that British Columbia makes against this country.

I consider this one of the most important features of the bill, so far as my State is concerned. For the past two years it has been reported that a large percentage of the unemployed in our State came in from British Columbia, and that more than half of those who applied for public aid in the city of Seattle came from this Province.

The department does not have sufficient assistance to enforce the law in the State of Washington. They ought to have a larger number of inspectors. The department ought also to have a vessel for the purpose of patroling Puget Sound. I am sorry that the committee did not accept my amendment upon this proposition, although I recognize that this is hardly the proper bill for legislation of that character.

The statements that I have made above have been largely suggested by a letter written by Mr. E. P. Marsh, president of the Washington State Federation of Labor, to Hon. William B. Wilson, Secretary of Labor, under date of November 5, 1915. This letter is the best presentation of the situation, so far as my State is concerned, that I have seen. It shows that Mr. Marsh has given the question a great deal of careful and conscientious consideration. His statement of the case also commends itself strongly for the spirit of fairness and conservatism with which he treats the problem. It is of sufficient importance until I think that, notwithstanding the fact that it is somewhat lengthy, it should be printed in full in the RECORD. I will insert it at this point, as it is worthy of a careful reading by the Members of this House. As I am going to insert this letter, I shall not take up further time in discussing any of the details, as they are covered more fully and in better shape in this letter than I could do it.

WASHINGTON STATE FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Everett, Wash., November 5, 1915.

Hon. WILLIAM B. WILSON,
Secretary of Labor, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: You will probably recall that during the Seattle convention of the American Federation of Labor a committee of local trade-unionists called upon you at your hotel and briefly discussed the subject of immigration as it appeared to affect the Northwest. I had the pleasure of meeting you at that time as a member of that committee. You will perhaps recall also that I introduced resolutions at that convention upon the subject of immigration, the same being the conclusions reached by the Immigration Conference held in that city just prior to the American Federation of Labor convention. Our resolutions were supported by Messrs. Gompers, Morrison, and others prominent in the deliberations and passed nearly unanimously.

I have had in mind for some time writing you at some length upon this topic and upon labor conditions in general in this State. If this letter appears unduly lengthy, I trust you will pardon its length.

Let me say in the beginning that I am writing in no spirit of hostile criticism. I know somewhat of the difficulties that beset any man in executive or administrative position who deals with labor problems. I realize that from the beginning of your work as a Cabinet official there has been but thinly veiled hostility on the part of some employers, reactionary politicians, and a portion at least of the daily press. In my capacity as a labor official, and as a private citizen as well, my mental and physical efforts are at the disposal of those who are striving to improve the lot of the toilers. Your years of useful service in the interests of toiling humanity furnish proof enough for me that your every thought and action is inspired by the purest motives. So please consider this letter in the spirit in which it is written, the desire to be helpful rather than merely critical, constructive rather than destructive.

My work as president of the Washington State Federation of Labor brings me into contact with every phase of industrial life in this section, as I am constantly engaged in field work. State Labor Commissioner E. W. Olson, whom you know, has been very helpful to me, and we have worked in the utmost harmony. Mr. Henry White, commissioner of immigration at Seattle, is a personal friend of mine, and so far as I have been able I have endeavored to aid him and he me. That our work may be productive of the best results is my reason for addressing this communication to you, trusting that I may make clear to you the viewpoint of labor in this section toward the work of your department what conditions appear to need remedying.

I am in complete accord with your employment-bureau feature. Frankly, with the refusal of the last legislature to enact a comprehensive State employment bureau law to take the place of the private agencies legislated out of business, I do not know just what we should have done without Federal aid. Labor unions naturally look mainly after their own members in the matter of employment. The State Employers' Association, in its attempt to operate an employment bureau, could not gain complete confidence of either workmen or the general public because of its known hostility to union labor. Your department steps into the breach in an impartial manner, fair to both employers and employees, regardless of union affiliation or lack of it, the only basis upon which a Federal or State bureau can be successfully operated until the principle of collective bargaining has been firmly established in American industrial life. Mr. White, your immigration commissioner in this district, and Mr. Wood, in charge of the employment work for the State, appear to be very much in earnest in their work of placing the man and the job in conjunction. They have already done commendable work along that line, and I shall be glad to touch upon it in my forthcoming annual report.

It is of small use, however, to attempt to deal with the unemployment problem through the medium of Federal employment agencies unless some effective check be placed upon the number of aliens entering. The European war has temporarily solved the immigration problem at our eastern ports of entry; it accentuated the problem upon our Canadian border. The number of men thrown out of work due directly to the war is problematical, but it is many thousands. One estimate places it at 80,000 in western Canada. Twelve hundred men were thrown out of work on one railroad construction job at Newport, British Columbia. Completion of construction work back of Prince Rupert released several thousand men. Municipal projects stopped. Many of these men were of the least desirable type, central and southern Europeans, the unskilled labor army, illiterate, ignorant of American standards of life and living, always a distinct menace. The statement has been made that previous to and including the year of 1912, Canada admitted one immigrant to every resident annually, thus at the close of a five-year period one-fourth of Canada's population were foreign born. Industrial activities in Canda, what there were, called for a higher type of workman than these men were. There were but two moves for these thousands to take. One was to herd in Canadian cities, trusting to charity or small jobs to eke out a living. The municipal authorities in Victoria, Vancouver, New Westminster, and other western Canada towns, instead of providing lodging and food for vagrants, as is done in so many American cities, drive men to the streets upon the approach of winter. The other move for them to make was to attempt to join their countrymen in the United States.

I have found in many places throughout this State a general feeling that there were far too many alien laborers coming into the United States. In Spokane I found members of unions out of work at their trades, with homes in some instances partly paid for, complaining that they could find no work, while laborers speaking a foreign tongue were employed upon a large railroad project within the city limits. There are no immigration officials on the border from the Cascades to the Idaho line save the train inspectors working under the Montreal office.

Last winter an investigation was made by State Labor Commissioner Olson into labor troubles occurring in King County, a short distance out of Seattle, in connection with a road contract. Mr. Olson personally appealed to the county commissioners for relief, and as a result an order was passed that in future all road contracts must contain a minimum wage clause. It was found that many of these workmen were foreigners; where they came from and how was unknown, while in the near-by coal mining town of Issaquah were many idle miners who had been out of work for a long time due to the closing of the mine and slack conditions in the entire mining district.

In Blaine and Anacortes, boundary towns, Mr. Olson and I were called to investigate alleged riots caused by the employment of orientals to the exclusion of white labor. These cases I shall refer to later in this letter.

For the past two winters organized labor and the city authorities of Seattle, acting in conjunction with other interested bodies, operated a municipal boarding and lodging house, an outgrowth of Jeff Davis's visit to Seattle during the American Federation of Labor convention. The statement is made that 40 per cent of the men receiving board and lodging in that hostelry were recent arrivals from British Columbia.

Last winter about 40 men were arrested by the Seattle police for raiding a dairy lunch room. Commissioner White informed me that he was satisfied that part of them had entered illegally, but that fact could not be brought out at the trial.

On June 9, 1915, Commissioner Henry M. White addressed the State Conference of Charities and Corrections, in session at Everett. The Everett Daily Herald of the following day quoted him, as follows:

"Henry M. White, United States commissioner of immigration stationed at Seattle, opened the arguing bee. Besides reading a paper that discussed employment bureaus, Commissioner White, in answer to questions, said that hordes of idle men were coming into this country from Canada and that the officers of the Government were totally unable to stop them. The reasons for the influx were the desire to escape war service, fear of punishment as citizens of foreign Governments, and most of all economic conditions, pronounced worse north of the line than south of it. Very nearly 1,000 had crossed in one day recently into Minnesota. Many were slipping through every week at Acme and Blaine, in this State, he said."

Miss Virginia McMechen is secretary of the charity organization in the city of Seattle. At the annual dinner of the organization, held on October 25, 1915, in her annual report, she made the following statement, as reported in the Seattle Post Intelligencer the following morning:

"The work given floating unemployed should be carried on outside the city limits, and in local jobs resident married men should be given preference. Many a broken home is due to the fact that the husband had to go away to seek work. The problem of the unemployed should be handled by the municipality. It is a social and not a police problem. Of the unemployed aided last year, two-thirds were nonresidents, a majority were unskilled, and 38 per cent were American born."

The city of Seattle operates a free municipal office and send out yearly approximately 32,000 persons to jobs. I asked the man in charge of the office not long ago what percentage of those applying for work were aliens. He replied that unfortunately no record was kept of the nationality of applicants but a very large percentage of them seemed to be newly arrived aliens.

We are unfortunate in that our industries are not varied. One of our largest industries is lumbering, employing approximately 50,000 men, or more than one-fourth of all workmen listed as hazardous by the industrial insurance commission and coming under the law. Other industries are neither large nor varied and are in large part seasonal, as is the lumber and shingle industry. For the past few years lumber and shingle markets have been demoralized, and industrial stagnation resulted, because there were not enough varied industries to hold the general level of employment up. A serious unemployment problem of our own has been greatly aggravated by a steady influx of aliens from Canada.

Let me relate briefly conditions existing in Blaine and Anacortes, arising out of employment of Asiatics in the fish canneries, particularly Anacortes, where I made a personal investigation, visiting the town several times and talking with all classes of citizens. In Blaine hostile demonstrations were made, water mains blown up, and anonymous threats of violence made if whites were not given preference in employment.

Anacortes is a town of approximately 6,000 people with but two main industries—salmon canning and lumbering. It is situated on Puget Sound, but off the main railroad lines and thus has not the floating class of labor that follows a trunk line of railroad.

TARIFF TALK.

Nearly all its people are of a permanent class, many of them home owners. In normal times the lumber and shingle mills absorb the bulk of the labor but the past few seasons have been abnormal. Mills were either closed or running on part time. One mill in normal times employing 200 men had been idle for months. The men with family ties found it difficult to leave their families and practically useless to do so as unemployment was prevalent. As a result they planted their gardens, picked up a stray day's work now and then, ran accounts with the stores up to the limit of their credit, hoping that with the opening of the canning season they might find enough work for themselves and their women to tide over the winter. Five canneries operated in the town this season. Before the expected run of fish, Japanese in large numbers appeared on the scene, living, it appears within company property. The employment of Japanese in these canneries seems to be a new thing as in former years Chinese were mainly the Asiatics employed. The whites did not seem to resent so much the employment of Chinese in limited numbers, probably because they had gotten used to them. The feeling against the Japanese became very bitter and muttered threats of violence were heard.

The cannery operators set up the defense that for certain work in the canneries the whites could not be relied upon, that because of the uncertain quantity of the pack and length of the season, they had to be assured that the pack would be taken care of and experience had taught them that they could not rely upon white labor. Accordingly they contracted with Chinese contractors for their labor supply months in advance of the canning season. The whites contend that every cannery position could have been filled by white men and women who would have been glad of the work and who would have stuck the season through. However that may be, the big fact remains that the only industry in the town outside of lumbering, which was in a depressed condition, was hiring Asiatics while white labor was idle and in need of the actual necessities of life. This bred a condition which made for disorder and possible serious trouble. I am confident from what I know of the tense feeling in that locality that both life and property might easily be in jeopardy another year unless the situation is remedied. I fervently trust that the cannerymen will approach the problem in a broad way and cooperate to end a bad situation. I do not believe they would employ Asiatics in preference to whites if it can be demonstrated that white labor is both procurable and dependable and your employment bureau might be the means of solving the problem. The perfect ease with which both Japanese and Chinese can be secured, due to the proximity to British Columbia where there is a limitless supply, and the fact that no immigration officer is stationed at Anacortes, the shifting of responsibility for an adequate labor supply to the shoulders of the labor contractor has worked against white labor and will continue to be a factor against it.

Mr. M. M. Mattison is political writer on the Seattle Daily and Sunday Times and may be aptly termed the "dean" of political writers in the State of Washington. He has been a journalist for many years, a shrewd observer of men and affairs, and a keen analysist. The following is from the Seattle Times of August 1, 1915, same being a signed article by Mr. Mattison:

FIGHT BREWING ON IMMIGRATION SITUATION—WITH MORE ALIENS STRIVING TO COME IN THROUGH WASHINGTON, FORCE REDUCED—ECONOMY IS EXPLANATION.

(By M. M. Mattison.)

Though the record shows that there were more arrests last year for illegal entry into this country than had been made during any other 12 months of the past, the Immigration Service forces at Seattle have been reduced by the transfer of four men to San Francisco; the watchman on the Deming bridge has been laid off and two more of the highest officials in the service on Puget Sound go on involuntary furloughs. One other was laid off some time ago.

In the meantime a department clerk, here on salary and expense, has been "rearranging the records," the amount paid for his services being sufficient to keep at least two of the higher officials at work. And also, in the meantime, special fees are being paid to special interpreters, which probably would be sufficient to pay the salary of a regular interpreter whom Washington officials feel they can not afford to employ.

An economy program is declared to be responsible for the changes.

PROTESTS PROVE UNAVAILING.

In other quarters it is estimated that there is a feeling of resentment over the fight started in the State legislature and supported by commercial organizations to transfer immigration headquarters from Montreal to Seattle. At present, instead of maintaining immigration headquarters at some Puget Sound port for foreigners coming to this country by foreign vessels which touch Canadian ports first, the immigration headquarters are maintained in Montreal. The scheme favors the Canadian Pacific Railroad, and protests have been unavailing.

An inquiry into this phase of the situation is to be made soon by at least three high officials. It is expected that Solicitor J. B. Densmore, Commissioner of Immigration A. Caminetti, and possibly Assistant Secretary of Labor Post will be here to inquire into the justice of the plan whereby immigration matters affecting the United States are handled from Canada.

NO PROBE OF REDUCTION PLAN.

But thus far no movement has been started toward an inquiry as to why the Puget Sound district force has been reduced, the San Francisco force increased, and the department handicapped in the Northwest.

For the past year it is declared that 1,400 arrests were made in Whatcom County alone by immigration officials, who discovered aliens unlawfully in this country. It is declared that during Shriner week Chinese landed openly at the piers of Seattle, and that there was no adequate check on the steamship Minnesota when she arrived, because there was an insufficient force left here to do the work.

These are charges—they may or may not be true—but they illustrate the gravity of the situation.

So, too, does the story that A. T. White, Japanese interpreter, Henry Monroe, head of the Chinese Bureau, and Thomas Lynch, inspector and sometimes acting assistant commissioner for this district, have been directed to take a vacation without pay sheds a light on the seriousness of the Puget Sound situation.

ALIENS FLOCK INTO STATE.

Since the European war broke out it is claimed that aliens have been flocking from Canadian points into the United States. Usually they have come across the border between Washington and British Columbia. They have been found hiding in tank cars, on steamboats, walking through the woods over forgotten trails, and coming brazenly over regular routes of transportation.

To check them an increase in the service was deemed advisable, but the officials at the National Capital determined that the economy program should be enforced at Seattle and at northwestern points so that San Francisco might not suffer, and instead of increases, reductions in the force have been ordered.

Labor leaders have become interested in the situation, and they, with the representatives of commercial organizations who have been fighting for a strengthening of the representation on Puget Sound, will lay a series of facts before the department board of inquiry when it comes to Seattle this month.

Starting out as an inquiry into the reasons why the Canadian Pacific was favored in transportation matters through the order making Montreal a headquarters for oriental immigration, the inquiry is apt to broaden into an investigation of immigration-law enforcement in the Northwest.

Entry may be made into this State from Canada both by land and water. Glancing over the map I find 16 wagon roads crossing the border between Blaine and Sumas, a distance of 20 miles. I find three more roads within 10 miles east of Sumas. Doing border patrol work between Blaine and Sumas are three men, with none on border work east of Sumas. Besides wagon roads, there are old, well-known trails, two of the best known of these being the Princeton and Hope trails, swinging through the Cascades east into Pateros, a place northeast of Wenatchee, in central Washington. Bands of Hindoos and other aliens have been seen by forest rangers on these trails. Once in eastern Washington there is not one chance in a thousand of apprehension. You have two men in North Yakima, 100 miles south of the line, engaged exclusively in employment work, and doing magnificent work, too, by the way. In Walla Walla, almost on the Oregon State line, there is one man, and he, too, has employment-office duties. In Spokane, the metropolis of eastern Washington, and the city to which all workmen in that part of the country head, there are but two men, and they also handle employment work. Spokane is also 100 miles south of the border, and is a railroad center for north, south, east, and west.

Motor transportation is fast becoming the prevalent mode of travel. The run from Vancouver, British Columbia, to Seattle may be made by a high-powered car in a little better than five hours. That the auto is becoming a favorite medium of illegal entry is proven by recent arrests and trials for smuggling of Chinese, of which I shall write later on in this letter. Yet if I am correctly informed there is not an automobile nor motorcycle at the disposal of the force in this district, the allowance formerly made border men for auto maintenance having been withdrawn upon ruling of the Federal comptroller that there were no funds available for that purpose.

Probably no body of water in the world of equal size offers the facilities for smuggling operations as does Puget Sound. Vancouver, Victoria, and New Westminster, headquarters for workmen in western Canada, and filled with Chinese, Japanese, and Hindoos, are Puget Sound ports. It is estimated that there are 30,000 Chinese in British Columbia. Victoria, with a population of 35,000, is said to have 7,000 Chinese. The industrial depression in Canada hit the Chinese hard, it being current report that many of them are in a starving condition. Vancouver and Victoria are but a few hours' run from Washington sound cities. The shore line offers innumerable landing places. The sound is dotted with islands where small boats may run to cover.

Steveston, British Columbia, is a canning town on the Fraser River and swarms with Orientals. To Ladner, British Columbia, by auto, it is but a short run, using the ferry, or the trip may be made from Steveston to Ladner by boat in 40 minutes. A 6-mile walk from Ladner lands one at Port Roberts, on American soil, where there are two canneries employing Chinese. Only 12 miles from Port Roberts is Semiamoo, with one big cannery employing Chinese, and it is but a stone's throw from Blaine, where there are five canneries. There is also a cannery at East Port Roberts. The run from Vancouver or Victoria to Anacortes may be made by boat in four hours, with chance of detection, once landed in Anacortes, reduced to a minimum. There is no boat inspection between Anacortes and Port Roberts, no inspector at Anacortes, no train inspector out of Anacortes, and there is direct rail connection with the coast line of the Great Northern for Seattle.

From Victoria to Port Angeles (Wash.) is a distance by water of 17 miles. During last June there were 11 indictments by the grand jury for smuggling white aliens in that district. Five pleaded guilty and several more were found guilty upon trial. During part of last year a strike was on in the shingle department of a big plant at that place. I make no charge that aliens were smuggled into that plant. Probably it was not necessary to do so as unemployment in the State at large made it an easy matter to find men. It might not be the policy under any circumstances of that particular firm to employ aliens, but in the event of labor disturbances in that or other plants in that territory, under present conditions, it would be possible to land aliens from Canada by the wholesale. The employing interests would be the ones to profit, even though they had no guilty knowledge nor participation in the smuggling operations. An immigration officer was formerly stationed at Port Angeles. He has been transferred to Port Townsend with both places to look after, while the man formerly at Port Townsend has been transferred elsewhere.

One or two fast launches are absolutely necessary to patrol Puget Sound waters. At present the only method used is to place inspectors on the boats running on regular schedules, good as far as it goes, but not greatly disturbing the peace of mind of the men profitably engaged in smuggling.

Returning to the subject of auto smuggling of Chinese. The local press has from time to time reported in its news columns stories of capture of illegally entered Chinese, some of them captured by purest accident.

About last February the press reported the capture of an auto load of Chinese between Blaine and Sumas, in charge of a Great Northern conductor named Dahl. Evidence at the trial was to the effect that he had repeatedly brought in Chinese via auto.

An auto collision north of Marysville, near Everett, resulted in Chinese captures, the smugglers confessing that they had made repeated trips and were regularly engaged in the industry. This was last August, and was uncovered by Inspector Turner, of Everett, according to newspaper reports, and might never have been found out but for the breakdown of the auto which aroused suspicion and caused Inspector Turner to get hurriedly on the job.

Last spring the same papers carried the story of a capture by the above officer of a number of Chinese in the Great Northern yards at Everett, concealed in an oil-tank car. If press reports are correct, several hundred have been brought in in this manner for shipment to San Francisco, New York, and elsewhere. Railroad employees were engaged in this business, it appears, a Great Northern fireman having been found guilty on trial in Seattle within the past few days as a result of further discoveries in the Great Northern yards in this city.

Chinese confessed last April that 200 had entered during the fiscal year via the box-car route and 40 more were waiting.

Last month there were something over 30 entries at the custom-house from Steveston, British Columbia, the town I have mentioned as swarming with Orientals.

There is small doubt there are several well-organized gangs of smugglers working on both sides of the line in comparative safety. Once in this country the aliens mingle with their countrymen with little chance of detection and work their way south and east. We have the two classes of surreptitious entry, Chinese and central and southern European, both a distinct menace to American standards. The Chinese smuggling business is peculiarly tempting as it means big money with the chances of detection small.

Now as to the Immigration Service itself. Undoubtedly there are some men in the service who have not the modern viewpoint of industrial and social life. Men who view the collection of head tax to be more desirable than to protect American labor by rigidly putting up the bars against those who will not readily assimilate. I am convinced that by far the larger number of men in the service are hard-working, conscientious men, with a high sense of duty. I believe in the sincerity of most of the men I have been privileged to meet. A breaking down of the service as regards border patrol seems not to be due to any dereliction on their part. There are not enough men in this district to attempt to cope with the situation nor facilities with which to work. On January 1 of this year there appears to have been 14 men under furlough, or nearly one-fourth the entire force in this district. This at a time when industrial depression was at its height and the need for thorough border patrol imperative. I note that you have by Executive order placed all furloughed men back in active service. I am glad that you have been able to make this order, but it does not relieve the situation in this territory. Mr. White tells me that but one man has been added to his jurisdiction since he assumed office.

The duties of employment work have been added to the other duties of the men in the service without the addition of any men. Indeed, the force has been numerically weakened during the past year by the removal of three watchmen to San Francisco, one inspector to Blaine, one death, and two furloughed monthly until recent date.

Mr. White tells me that he does not believe the efficiency of the men in the service has been materially lessened because of the added duties, as he has required them to better systematize their work and increase their output. Without in any way seeming to criticize Mr. White—for I am in full sympathy with his work and know of the handicaps he is working under—allow me to voice what I think about the placing of employment duties upon the shoulders of those who have other duties to perform.

I do not believe the men can do efficient work in the employment department and at the same time effectively perform other duties. I have in mind a concrete case. I know of one man in the service in this district who has a splendid record for efficiency in field work, in detecting surreptitious entries. He follows up all sorts of clues from all sorts of sources. Yet he is expected to carry on the employment work, with no assistant, which means he must stay close to his office or the employment feature dwindles into thin air. If he does that, his chance of rendering efficient service in checking illegal entry is minimized, as a man can not do routine office work and keep very much in touch with things outside. This man has proven his efficiency as a field officer; he would probably be just as efficient an office man, but he can not be both. Yet to withdraw him from a field where he has done such good service in one branch would not help the situation at all, as it is as necessary to put a stop to illegal entry as it is to find work for the unemployed. What that man needs is an office assistant to do the purely clerical work, and still the records of his office would argue that he needs no assistant. What would seem to be an anomaly is not an anomaly at all when the situation is understood.

I believe there will have to be some division of the work so that those whose duties are to check immigration shall be left free to do that work, and those to whom are assigned employment duties allowed to concentrate their attention upon that. I am well aware that the department is doing the best it can without funds with which to work and that if the employment bureau was to be started at all it had to be with the force of men already in the department. You have made a splendid beginning at that work and limitless possibilities are in sight. But I am forced to believe that the immigration law enforcement has to some extent suffered in consequence, because of the inability of men to carry on simultaneously two distinct tasks, one calling for outside activity and the other for close attention to office routine. I offer this then as a suggestion for the future when you may be given adequate funds with which to work.

I am informed that Federal legislation will be necessary to secure funds for proper auto patrol. Men can not cope with high-powered autos, if they themselves are afoot. Auto smugglers have been successfully eluding the watchmen stationed in the northern part of the State, and doing it with an exasperating regularity, if the confessions made by captured smugglers are any criterion. I believe, too, that the owners of autos used in smuggling should be compelled to forfeit them to the Government when captured, not returned to them as is now the case.

I have spoken of the need of speedy launches for water patrol. This to my mind is an imperative necessity.

Would it not be a good idea to deputize forest rangers as officers of your department? The trails leading down from British Columbia, which I have mentioned, lead through forest reserves and are under observation by Government rangers.

The State fish commissioner has a launch which regularly visits the canneries and traps; is constantly on patrol during the fishing season among traps located near the boundary. Could not your department place a man aboard that launch to good purpose?

Commissioner White believes, and I am inclined to agree with him, that there should be Federal legislation penalizing the man himself who willfully breaks the laws of this country by surreptitious entry. He believes this would have a more deterrent effect upon immigration of the undesirable sort than our present method of punishing only those who aid him to come in.

In a personal letter written to Senator MILES POINDEXTER, of this State, at the time the Burnett bill was pending, I suggested an amendment detailing to active field service for a period of years the bureau positions in Washington, D. C. I believe I would extend it to district headquarters of the service as well. My idea is that the men in the service ought to be brought into active contact with field work, that they might know from first-hand information the actual conditions that confront the service. I am free to say that I have learned more about the labor movement from actual contact with workingmen and working conditions, from being allowed an insight into their working lives, through spending 20 years of my life at a trade, than I ever learned from the printed page, and I am something of a reader at that. Orders in effect in the Army and Navy Departments covering compulsory field service seem to have good effect in that branch of Government service.

It seems to me that the division of authority between the Seattle and Montreal offices is a serious mistake and is fatal to proper enforcement of the immigration and exclusion act. I can not help but feel that long residence in Canada gives to an American immigration official a Canadian rather than an American viewpoint. He associates constantly with Canadians, both in official and private life. There are times when Canadian officials certainly can not hold the same views we do, from economic reasons if from no other. I have no objection to the stationing of American officials in Canadian border towns, but believe they all ought to be under the Seattle office. I believe the headquarters for United States officials, stationed both in this State and in British Columbia, should be in Seattle, and all inspection of aliens entering or attempting to enter this State should be under the Seattle office.

No European emigrant destined for Canada can come into Canada through the United States, but must enter Canada directly, giving to the Canadian Pacific Railway a monopoly on transportation that takes away much business from American railroads.

United States immigration officials have no means of obtaining knowledge as to aliens entering Canada, where they come from, their characteristics, station in life—many things it would be helpful to know, in veiw of the fact that so many of them ultimately head for the United States. Were these facts available immediately upon arrival in Canada of Europeans, it would greatly aid our officials.

Let me reiterate the high regard I have for the men in the service I have been permitted to come in contact with. As best I can I want to work with and aid Commissioner White, of Seattle, and Mr. Wood, State head of the employment department. Theirs is a big task, as is that of every official in the department. It is their duty to keep out the undesirables, to aid those lawfully entered to get their feet planted right in the paths of American citizenship. In your employment work you have in reality started the process of rebuilding men who have come perilously near the rocks, who have sounded the depths of despair in a ceaseless quest for work, victims of a private employment-agency system that has left them bitter, discouraged, heartsick, contemptuous of American institutions and our form of government. The making over of inefficient men, hanging on the edge of society, into self-respecting, efficient, proud citizens of this Republic, is the noblest work in which men can engage. It is the work facing your department, and you, Mr. Secretary, I know to be a man of splendid vision.

In inditing this letter to you I have endeavored to be helpful in criticism, neither harsh nor destructive, knowing well that some of the conditions I have described have ere this been brought to your notice and that you are working toward a solution, but hoping that perhaps I have covered some important points that have escaped your attention. I realize that Congress must aid you and that public sentiment has to be aroused, as a rule, before Congress will act upon many measures that affect the public welfare.

I have dealt with the problem from a purely local standpoint, because of my knowledge of and official connection with local industrial conditions. I realize perfectly that the problem is not a local one, but that we of the West and you in the East suffer alike or prosper alike in an industrial and social sense, accordingly as we deal with it. For a long period in our national life the tide of migration was ever westward. The workers in the East, crowded out of employment by incoming aliens, the ambitious farmer lad wanting room to expand, all faced the western slope, followed in turn by the second generation of immigrants. There are not lacking signs of a reverse movement of migration. Despite the vastness of our western domain, there is little arable land upon terms within the reach of the man with little or no means. An imbecile policy, or, rather, a lack of any policy of land development at all upon the part of the States, is responsible for this condition. Our industries are not sufficiently developing to care for the oversupply of labor, and we have an idle, drifting labor army, purposeless, aimless.

This condition can be largely remedied in time through your Federal Employment Bureau, but only by stopping the ceaseless flow of undesirable aliens can you systematize employment opportunities, regulate and direct the supply of labor.

In this great work you deserve the whole-hearted cooperation of every person who understands that the Nation's well-being, the social happiness of all our citizens, depends absolutely upon the steady, remunerative employment of labor.

Trusting that you will give this letter careful perusal, and assuring you of my warmest personal regards and hearty cooperation,

I beg leave to remain,

Respectfully, yours,

E. P. MARSH,
President Washington State Federation of Labor.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 7, page 51, the words "one hundred thousand" and insert in lieu thereof "fifty thousand," and in line 25, page 50, and lines 1 and 2——

Mr. SLAYDEN. What is the second amendment?

Mr. BENNET. I have not completed it—to strike out the last word in line 25, page 50, all of line 1, on page 51, to the word "engaged" in line 2, page 51, so that the section would read, commencing at line 24, "of this act which excludes contract laborers and induced and assisted immigrants, may employ for such purposes without reference to the provisions of the said civil-service act," and so forth, and reduce the amount from $100,000 to $50,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 50, line 25, strike out "and," the last word in the line, and the following language on lines 1 and 2, page 51, "for detail upon additional service under this act when not so engaged."

In line 7, page 51, strike out "$100,000" and insert "$50,000."

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, if I could have the attention of the chairman of the committee, I will say that I had the honor of drawing this section in 1907, that duty having been conferred upon me by the committee, and it was done for the purpose of giving the department the power to enforce the contract-labor law. It has worked well, and therefore I am not going to permit, if I can prevent it, that section to be prostituted for the purpose of a rape on the civil service.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman explain the nature of the services to be performed in this connection?

Mr. BENNET. As I go along, I will.

Under the existing law the Secretary of Labor has the right to spend out of the appropriation not to exceed $50,000 a year under the same provisions of law as are applicable to the Secret Service—that is, he can employ whom he pleases at such a salary as he pleases; to do anything that he thinks is necessary to enforce the contract-labor law. Now, gentlemen say, and give as the reason that they are raising this to $100,000, that it is because they need more men. Now, if the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] will give me his attention, I will tell him what the condition is, because I am satisfied that after I tell him what the condition is, he will agree.

The appropriations for the enforcement of the act, for 1914, were $2,550,000; for 1915, $2,649,000; and for 1916, $2,450,000, the latter being the smallest, and rightly so, because immigration has dropped off. Out of that reduced appropriation of $2,450,000 every single employee in the field in the Immigration Service has been furloughed without pay at least a month during this fiscal year, and those reductions have amounted to $110,000. In addition to that, vacancies have occurred through death, resignations, and transfers, amounting to $70,000 more, which have not been filled, making a total of $180,000.

Now, if they really wanted this work done, they could have taken those men in the civil service and had them do the work instead of laying them off. Now, what do they propose to do? They propose to add this language to the law:

And for detail upon additional service under this act when not so engaged.

That is, that the Secretary of Labor can employ a man under this provision without reporting his name to the Civil Service Commission, at any salary that the Secretary of Labor fixes, use him one day on contract-labor work, and then put him in the place of a civil-service employee. What they have done is, pro tanto, to take out of the operation of the civil-service act the employees of the Immigration Bureau. It is the most flagrant attack upon the civil-service law that has been made during this administration. Now, I will tell you what they do.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENNET. I am reliably informed that under this $50,000 that is already in the law there has one man been appointed who is a bookkeeper, who still holds his position as a bookkeeper, still draws his salary as bookkeeper, and reports at the office of the United States twice a month.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. COX. Who is that man?

Mr. BENNET. I will get to that.

Mr. COX. Will you put his name in the RECORD?

Mr. BENNET. I will not promise that. I will give the gentleman a chance to put it in the RECORD.

Mr. COX. I will put it in if you will tell me who he is.

Mr. BENNET. All right; I will give the gentleman a chance. That man continues in his position as bookkeeper and draws $2,500 a year.

Mr. COX. Is he drawing his salary as bookkeeper for a private concern?

Mr. BENNET. Yes; under this existing appropriation that they want to double, and reports twice a month, and only twice a month, and signs the pay roll, and draws his check, and it is permissible under the law. Now, they want $50,000 more to spend in that way.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. How did that original $50,000 ever get into the legislation?

Mr. BENNET. Before the gentleman came on the floor I stated to the committee that I drew the proposition myself. That is what the gentleman wanted me to say.

Mr. GARDNER. I do not know. I once got an employee in myself, without passing the civil-service examination, under that provision. I rather like that.

Mr. BENNET. Yes. I will say to the committee that I drafted the provision, and that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] got not only one but two men on the roll, and his father-in-law got two more. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. I apologize to the gentleman. I did not know that I got two. I hope I did. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] say how many he got? [Laughter.]

Mr. BENNET. I got none.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Will the gentleman tell whether or not the gentleman from Massachusetts got those coming to him?

Mr. BENNET. Gentleman, I am talking about this as a serious matter, not in the way of persiflage. I confess that I am a good deal of a partisan, and if a Democratic chief of bureau will remove a man because he is a Republican, though competent, and put in a man because he is a Democrat and competent, I think that is what he ought to do.

A firm in New Jersey was complained of for violation of this contract-labor law, and the department at first did not think it amounted to very much, but they gave the case to a particular inspector, and that inspector went out and worked on the case day and night. I happened to know about this case, because I was retained by the defendant; and that man—that inspector—by hard work and knowledge of the law and expert opinion, built up a case that was absolutely impregnable; so much so that we walked into court and confessed judgment for $6,000, and paid that money into the office of the court. Within a week afterwards the department removed that man who turned in that $6,000, and they put in his place a man who has not made a single complaint since against a violator of the law.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. You did not have anything to do with having him removed? [Laughter.]

Mr. BENNET. I did not; and I will say to the gentleman from Georgia that a week or 10 days after that man was removed I was in conference with the man who paid this $6,000, and I said to him, "Do you know what happened to that man?" He said, "No." I said, "He was removed from office." You will excuse the language, but he said in reply, "That is a damned outrage." [Laughter.]

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. My own man has been removed from office. I ought to have a grievance, too. [Laughter.]

Mr. BENNET. I do not know about that.

Mr. GARDNER. You say I got two. I thought I got only one. [Laughter.]

Mr. BENNET. I think the gentleman got two, but they are not the men who are doing this good work.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for three minutes more.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York be allowed to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. If it is a plain, ordinary steal, and some man is in there who is stealing—and it is virtually the same thing if he is drawing pay there and doing no work—does not the gentleman think he owes it to the Government to give us his name, so that he can be investigated?

Mr. BENNET. I will say to the gentleman that before I get through I will redeem my promise that I made to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox].

Now, they are not utilizing to the best advantage the money they now have, and the plain purpose of this provision is to enable the department to increase the number of its exempt employees. Nobody can deny that. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] will not deny it.

I want this House to know exactly what they are doing; that they are throwing out of the civil service men who are there and vacating their positions and superseding them by men who are exempt in their positions. Oh, I suppose there is nobody on the Democratic side who cares anything about the Democratic platform any more, but I will read the provision in that document in relation to the civil service:

> The law pertaining to the civil service should be honestly and rightly enforced, to the end that merit and ability should be the standard of appointment and promotion rather than service rendered to a political party; and we favor a reorganization of the civil service, with adequate compensation commensurate with the work performed, for all officers and employees.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FESS. I would like to know whether it is in order to read the Democratic platform in this Congress? [Laughter.]

Mr. BENNET. Oh, yes; I represent a Democratic district, and I claim that right.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, why does not the gentleman read that to the head of this bureau instead of to this House? [Laughter.]

Mr. BENNET. I am a Member of Congress, and I deem it my duty to point out wrongs that should be rectified in the body of which I am a Member. I have not sunk so low that I have to go to the head of a department so long as I am a Member of Congress. [Applause.]

If the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] will introduce a resolution asking for an investigation of the manner in which this money has been expended from the time of the original enactment, covering Republican administration as well as Democratic, it will be referred to the Committee on Rules, of which I am a member, and I will join with my Democratic colleagues on my committee on reporting out a rule to investigate the entire expenditure.

Mr. COX. The gentleman is only one member of the Committee on Rules. I do not know whether the Committee on Rules would report that resolution out or not, but I will say to the gentleman that I will introduce such a resolution if the gentleman from New York will speak out and give us that name. Those who are responsible for it will soon rectify it.

Mr. BENNET. I gave the case.

Mr. COX. Yes; but the gentleman has not given the name. He is giving only the facts.

Mr. BENNET. I have given the facts, and if a Democratic administration can not remedy that case from the description I have given they will be grossly derelict in their duty.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has made a statement before this House. Is it not fair that he should identify the case and name the man?

Mr. BENNET. I am giving the whole House the facts. The disclosure of the particular name might get some gentleman in the department into trouble.

Mr. GORDON. Ought he not to be in trouble?

Mr. BENNET. I would get this man into trouble in a minute.

Mr. GORDON. Give us his name, and we will attend to it.

Mr. BENNET. I am the guardian of my own honor and the architect and director of my own methods. If the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] will draw a resolution and refer it to the Committee on Rules demanding an investigation of this matter, I will do all I can to have it reported.

Mr. COX. I will do that if the gentleman will vote to report the resolution out. I will put such a resolution in the basket.

Mr. BENNET. I will agree to vote for it and do all I can to report it out, to investigate the way this money has been spent from the beginning, under Republican administration as well as Democratic administration; and I will say what I know, that this doubling of the appropriation is absolutely uncalled for. If this appropriation is doubled, it is just simply waste. Not only that, it is a rape of the civil service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New York be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BURNETT. Make it three minutes and I will make no objection.

Mr. HOWARD. I will not object if the gentleman from New York will divulge the name of that employee. If he will not divulge his name, then I will object.

Mr. MANN. Let him object.

Mr. BENNET. Of course.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. HOWARD. I object.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to conclude the discussion on this.

Mr. MANN. I think I will not want more than five minutes, but I may want a little more. There will be no delay.

I did not hear all that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] said, because my attention was diverted.

A few years ago there was a very severe criticism of the State Department, made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN], chairman of a committee investigating the expenditures in the State Department, concerning certain expenditures that were not required to be itemized. The gentleman from Missouri was rather insistent upon having a bill passed authorizing certain Members of Congress to have access to all of the secret expenditures in the State Department.

There are many reasons why in the State Department it is necessary to expend considerable sums of money without giving any information concerning the expenditure. There may be some reason in the Bureau of Immigration. Fifty thousand dollars is quite a bunch of money to expend without vouchers. It used to be $25,000 in the State Department. I believe we have increased it properly since we have had trouble on the Mexican border. This proposes to double the amount to $100,000. I do not know how much of this money is expended without submitting vouchers; in other words, without being itemized. But under the provisions of the law they can expend that $50,000 nominally for the purposes stated in the law, but no itemized account is required. They can call it what they please. Now, it is proposed to double that to $100,000 and to go outside of the original intention of the law, which was merely to enforce the contract-labor section of the immigration law and to authorize the appointment for other purposes of employees under the bureau, not from the civil service list, so that the Secretary can pay such compensation as he pleases, can increase it or decrease it, spend it all on one person if he wants to, and render no itemized account of it. I do not think the provision of law ought to be extended unless it be absolutely necessary. No reason has yet been given for the provision in reference to the detail of additional service as provided by the language in this section. Under the section as it reads the Secretary or the Commissioner may employ persons nominally for the purpose of enforcing the contract-labor law, and put them upon detailed service as he pleases, pay them such compensation as he pleases, and render no itemized account. No other account amounts to anything. I hope the gentleman from Alabama will be able to give some excuse for this.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, as was remarked a while ago, the smuggling business has recently increased to an alarming extent all along the border. In many instances it is necessary that a very different class of men be employed than those who come under the regular civil-service examination. While I was a member of the Immigration Commission with the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET], I remember that we found along the Mexican and Californian border a regular pool or trust in smuggling, that some of our own inspectors were in it, that for $150 they allowed a Chinaman to come in. Somebody got to cutting the price, bringing them in for $50, and they got into a row among themselves, and in that way the matter became known. In order to detect such frauds and to ferret out these subterfuges we had to employ a number of expert detectives. We could not get them at the ordinary prices of civil-service employees. In many cases we paid $25 or $40 or $50 a day to those men, but they did good work, and as a result of that some of the United States inspectors themselves were landed in jail. That was eight years ago. Now it is utterly impossible for the Commissioner General of Immigration or the Department of Labor to depend entirely upon their civil-service employees to do this work. Therefore the necessity of having this law, which allows them some leeway, in order that they may employ the necessary men. Then if they are not being used for a particular purpose they ought not to have to discharge a good man, who perhaps they could not get next time, but as is provided here to detail him to do something else. It strikes me that it is unfair for the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] to single out the case of a person whose name he is not willing to divulge. The intimation I have from a brief conversation with the Chief of the Bureau of Immigration is that there has been no such case as the bookkeeper that the gentleman referred to. If there has really been such a case, the gentleman ought not to tie a string to the proposition that he makes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox]. There is no charge here that there has been any fraud or mismanagement or misapplication of funds by the Immigration Bureau, Republican or Democratic. Then, why say, "If you will have a general investigation of a lot of conditions that nobody charges anything against, then I will give the name of a particular man whom he thinks ought to be investigated"?

I submit that that is not the fair way for fair-minded men to make charges and statements of this kind on the floor of the House, to undertake to go into a general investigation of a lot of things which need no investigation before a gentleman will tell the House of Representatives the name of the man who he says has been guilty of these things in order that there may be an investigation. If what he states is true, there ought to be an investigation not of the whole bureau for years and years back but an investigation of that particular case. Therefore, let gentlemen when they make charges of that kind be fair enough to name the man in order that there may be an investigation. I undertake to say when he makes his categorical and specific charge the Rules Committee will no doubt report a rule, not for a general investigation of everything that the whole bureau has been doing for the last 20 or 30 years ever since that $50,000 fund was provided, but an investigation of the facts in regard to this particular case. Is it not right, and the gentleman owes it to himself to be fair enough to name the man. When he does not fix his specific case, when he does not mention any particular name, then I should like to know what becomes of the gentleman's charges as to these matters of fraud or misapplication of funds.

I say that it is necessary. The Senate believed that it was necessary two years ago and kept this in, and, as I recollect, four years ago it was increased to $100,000. I am not sure about that. But if we want to prevent Chinese immigration and people coming over the border, as the operations of the steamships have become much restricted on account of war conditions, men fit for this particular class of work ought to be employed, and we can not do that if we are confined to the cast-iron rules of the civil service.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from New York, I wish to state that the Commissioner of Immigration in the last report stated the following facts:

> With respect to the special arrangements for the apprehension of smugglers and smuggled aliens, which I then reported had been placed in operation in March, 1914, I have to state that the same has been continued with increasing good results; so that the plan has now to its credit since inauguration the institution of proceedings against 167 persons found engaged in illegal importation of contraband Chinese, 149 of whom were arrested, 80 of whom have been convicted, 43 are awaiting trial, 25 have been discharged, and 1 died, the remainder being fugitives from justice.

It was upon this statement as to the smuggling that was going on that I voted for this provision in the bill, and for no other.

Mr. BENNET. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. BENNET. Will the gentleman point out any place in the report or in the hearings before the committee where the Commissioner General or the Secretary of Labor has asked for the additional $50,000?

Mr. SABATH. I have not the report of the commissioner except upon this matter.

Mr. BENNET. Why, the gentleman has the report, the entire report of the commissioner, which he just read from.

Mr. SABATH. I do not see anything here in regard to it, but the committee has been carefully investigating, and they have come to the conclusion that the smuggling of the Chinese should be prevented in every way that was possible, and that if the department required an additional $50,000 it should be forthcoming. It was for those reasons that I supported it.

Mr. BENNET. The department does not ask for it.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate be closed on this section.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will not the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BURNETT. No; I move that all debate be closed upon this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves that all debate be closed upon this amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania) there were 56 ayes and 36 noes.

So the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 50, line 25, strike out the last "and" in the line, and the following language on page 51: "or detail upon additional service under this act when not so engaged;" also, on page 51, line 7, strike out "$100,000" and insert "$50,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BENNET and Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania) there were 59 ayes and 75 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

SEC. 26. That all exclusive privileges of exchanging money, transporting passengers or baggage, or keeping eating houses, and all other like privileges in connection with any United States immigrant station, shall be disposed of to the lowest responsible and capable bidder, after public competition, notice of such competitive bidding having been made in two newspapers of general circulation for a period of two weeks, subject to such conditions and limitations as the Commissioner General of Immigration, under the direction or with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, may prescribe, and all receipts accruing from the disposal of such exclusive privileges shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States. No such contract shall be awarded to an alien. No intoxicating liquors shall be sold at any such immigration station.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that in line 20, page 52, the words "such exclusive" should be stricken out for the reason that there are privileges, such as telegraph privileges, that are not exclusive, and the receipts accruing from those should be turned into the Treasury of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 52, line 20, strike out the words "such exclusive."

Mr. MANN. That would be the law anyhow. The only thing this section covers is exclusive privileges. Any money received by the department as receipts has to be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. The gentleman spoke of the telegraph privileges. Do they advertise those?

Mr. BENNET. No.

Mr. MANN. This says that they do.

Mr. BENNET. There are two, Western Union and the Postal.

Mr. MANN. They both have exclusive privileges. Does the gentleman from New York mean that they can not have more than one eating place?

Mr. BENNET. I do; only one eating place is permitted at any immigrant station, and it is put up at public competition.

Mr. MANN. Only one place to get a bite to eat on Ellis Island? Can they not have anything to eat in the hospital?

Mr. BENNET. You can not buy it.

Mr. MANN. I am glad I do not have to enter there.

Mr. BENNET. Well, inasmuch as the gentleman started it, I will say that if he should try to come in as an alien he would be debarred.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am authorized to say that the chairman will accept the amendment.

Mr. MANN. What does the bidder do when he makes a bid—offer to pay a certain amount for the privilege?

Mr. BENNET. What is done is this: Regular specifications are issued—I am talking about the eating privilege—there is an exclusive eating privilege, an exclusive privilege for handling baggage, and an exclusive privilege for changing money. Regular specifications are issued by the Department of Labor, and the men bid. They say they will furnish the meals described in the specifications for so much, and every man that bids agrees in connection with his bid to maintain a restaurant at which food shall be sold to the employees and visitors at fair prices.

Mr. MANN. What money is it that is paid into the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. BENNET. The money that is paid into the Treasury of the United States is the rental amount of $1,200 for the eating privilege, and I do not carry the other figures in my mind.

Mr. MANN. It says "all receipts accruing from the disposal of such exclusive privileges shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States." What does that mean—money the bidders pay?

Mr. BENNET. Yes; money that the bidders pay.

Mr. MANN. And yet the section provides that the contract shall be let to the lowest bidder. The man that pays the lowest amount gets the contract.

Mr. BENNET. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. That is what it says. It says that the money arising from the privileges should be put into the Treasury of the United States. It says that the contract shall be disposed of to the lowest responsible and capable bidder.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, it is no part of my duties to defend this bill, and that function probably devolves upon the very able gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN], who seems now to be in charge.

Mr. MANN. But this has not been in the law before.

Mr. BENNET. Oh, yes; that is existing law and has been for 20 years. What they mean by the lowest bidder is the man who will furnish the meals to the immigrants at the lowest price.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That is it exactly.

Mr. BENNET. That may be a very unfortunate method of expression, but that is the way it has been construed for a great many years.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 33. That it shall be unlawful and be deemed a violation of the preceding section to pay off or discharge any alien employed on board any vessel arriving in the United States from any foreign port or place, unless duly admitted pursuant to the laws and treaties of the United States regulating the immigration of aliens: Provided, That in case any such alien intends to reship on board any other vessel bound to any foreign port or place, he shall be allowed to land for the purpose of so reshipping, under such regulations as the Secretary of Labor may prescribe to prevent aliens not admissible under any law, agreement, convention, or treaty from remaining permanently in the United States, and may be paid off, discharged, and permitted to remove his effects, anything in such laws or treaties or in this act to the contrary notwithstanding, provided due notice of such proposed action first be given by the master or the seaman himself to the principal immigration officer in charge at the port of arrival.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "first," in line 4, page 58.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CRISP). The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 58, line 4, by striking out the word "first."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 34. That any alien seaman who shall land in a port of the United States contrary to the provisions of this act shall be deemed to be unlawfully in the United States, and shall, at any time within three years thereafter, upon a warrant of the Secretary of Labor, be taken into custody and brought before a board of special inquiry for examination as to his qualifications for admission to the United States, and if not admitted said alien seaman shall be deported at the expense of the appropriation for this act as provided in section 20 of this act.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Are these sections relating to seamen, and so forth, brought down to conform to the so-called seamen's act?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes. They were amended in the Senate, and the Senate report so states. While the seamen's bill had not been passed at that time, yet it was reported, and it was understood it would be passed, and they were amended so as to conform specifically to it.

Mr. MANN. The seamen's act, as it passed into law, was very different from what it was when it passed the Senate.

Mr. BURNETT. I understand they have been compared by the departments and that there is no conflict.

Mr. MANN. The department has gone over it?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I notice here that they have stricken out the words respecting deserting the vessel and inserted the word "land." I suppose that was the reason for that change?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. They do not any longer desert.

Mr. BURNETT. Exactly, because the seaman's bill is supposed not to discourage desertion, and, therefore, the word

"first" was stricken out in order that even if the seaman lands he must give notice.

Mr. MANN. Suppose a seaman comes under the seaman's act and the immigration act on a vessel and is illiterate, and wants to take his time and leave the vessel? Can he do it?

Mr. BURNETT. If he gives notice after landing.

Mr. MANN. If he is illiterate can he leave his vessel?

Mr. BURNETT. Why, yes. As I understand it, any one can if he is going to reship.

Mr. MANN. What does he do if he is going to reship again? He can not go on shore and go where he pleases.

Mr. BURNETT. He makes the report that is required of his intention to reship. That is provided for.

Mr. MANN. Suppose a man wants to take his time and leave the vessel under the seaman's act. That will frequently happen, and I presume many of them may be illiterate, some of them anyway. What rights has he when he goes on shore? Is he confined anywhere; can he go anywhere he pleases? That would be an easy way for a man to get into the country. He has no money and he could not give a bond.

Mr. BURNETT. If he is here in violation of the law he is deported. The master has to give notice, and then this amendment provides that the seaman himself shall give notice.

Mr. MANN. The master will not give notice because the seaman wants to leave the vessel and leave the vessel without seamen. It may be an indirect strike. That is likely to occur even under the seamen's act. What can the seaman do? You say, give notice. You may talk about deporting him, but if he wanted to come in for that purpose you would never find him. That is what I want to know. If he was trying to avoid the immigration law he would not be standing around on the dock waiting for an officer to deport him.

Mr. BURNETT. It is like it was before as to other inadmissible aliens. If he comes in and is inadmissible for other causes, he will have to be hunted up. The authorities will have to find him before they can deport him.

Mr. MANN. Heretofore he had to run away from the master, who had the right to detain him on board the vessel, but he can not now. The master no longer has control over him. The seaman has the right to leave the vessel. He can not be taken into custody unless under the immigration law. I was trying to ascertain whether there was a loophole, as I feared there would be when we passed the seamen's act unless it was covered in the new immigration act.

Mr. BURNETT. This was referred to the various departments, and my understanding is that it is provided for. If he goes ashore and dodges, they have simply got to find him, just as they would any other man who had come in unlawfully.

Mr. MANN. If he can not go ashore, then the provision in the seamen's act authorizing him to leave the vessel amounts to nothing. If he can go ashore and go where he pleases, then any provision which you have in this bill amounts to nothing unless you find him again.

Mr. BURNETT. Of course not, unless we catch him.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, he is safe.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman a question. Now, under the seamen's act there is no provision made for taking care of these seamen that come into a port. They can come in and desert and can not be arrested and taken back. They can demand one-half of their wages and go ashore. Now, if there is no provision here, you have left a loophole open wide enough to bring in thousands of these aliens.

Mr. BURNETT. Not under this law.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Where is the provision here?

Mr. BURNETT. That may be a fault under the alien-seamen law, but I will not discuss that.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Unless there is some provision here to care for these aliens, there is none, for there is nothing in the seamen's law.

Mr. BURNETT. That was the suggestion made by the gentleman from Illinois a moment ago, and they simply have to be hunted down, just like one who comes in who is a criminal on the other side—that is, unless he gives notice he is illegally here—and the very fact he comes in will render him deportable.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The difference is this, that the ordinary alien makes a landing at a certain port and is examined before he is permitted to enter; but when a seaman comes, he comes right into the port and lands at the wharf, and he can leave the vessel at any time.

Mr. SABATH. I wish to state to the gentleman from Washington, as well as the gentleman from Illinois, that that is provided for in section 36——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. What page?

Mr. SABATH. Page 60, in line 10, and is as follows:

And before the departure of any such vessel it shall be the duty of such owner, agent, consignee, or master to deliver to such immigration officer a further list containing the names of all alien employees who were not employed thereon at the time of the arrival, but who will leave port thereon at the time of her departure, and also the names of those, if any, who have been paid off and discharged, and of those, if any, who have deserted or landed.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. What becomes of the men when the vessel comes into port if the sailors were to leave, and then when the vessel sailed, probably a week after, when loaded, what would become of those seamen in the meantime?

Mr. SABATH. The owner of the vessel would report any who desert.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. But when he goes to depart, not when he comes in; the sailor may be away for a week or more, as I understand the provision here.

Mr. SABATH. No; I think if the gentleman will read the section carefully he will find that we make proper provision for illegal entries on the part of seamen, and then further on in the section we are reading now it provides that if they enter illegally and they are found at any time within three years they must be subject to an examination, and if they can not pass the examination to which all other aliens are subjected they will be ordered deported.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. When this bill was under consideration before I called the attention of the committee to this subject, and unless you have taken care of it in this bill, it is not taken care of at all; that is certain.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 35. That it shall be unlawful for any vessel carrying passengers between a port of the United States and a port of a foreign country, upon arrival in the United States, to have on board employed thereon any alien afflicted with idiocy, imbecility, insanity, epilepsy, tuberculosis in any form, or a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease, if it appears to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor, from an examination made by a medical officer of the United States Public Health Service, and is so certified by such officer, that any such alien was so afflicted at the time he was shipped or engaged and taken on board such vessel and that the existence of such affliction might have been detected by means of a competent medical examination at such time; and for every such alien so afflicted on board any such vessel at the time of arrival the owner, agent, consignee, or master thereof shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $50, and pending departure of the vessel the alien shall be detained and treated in hospital under supervision of immigration officials at the expense of the vessel; and no vessel shall be granted clearance pending the determination of the question of the liability to the payment of such fine and while it remains unpaid: Provided, That clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such question upon the deposit of a sum sufficient to cover such fine: Provided further, That such fine may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Labor, be mitigated or remitted.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, until the gentleman from Illinois spoke in reference to the seamen my attention had not been called to these particular provisions in relation to the La Follette law, and I want to say in all frankness that unless in another place these particular provisions are amended, why, you have not any exclusion statute at all.

Mr. BURNETT. As to alien seamen?

Mr. BENNET. As to anybody in Europe who wants to come.

Mr. BURNETT. All right.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 36. That upon the arrival of any vessel in the United States from any foreign port or place it shall be the duty of the owner, agent, consignee, or master thereof to deliver to the principal immigration officer in charge of the port of arrival lists containing the names of all aliens employed on such vessel, stating the positions they respectively hold in the ship's company, when and where they were respectively shipped or engaged, and specifying those to be paid off and discharged in the port of arrival; or lists containing so much of such information as the Secretary of Labor shall by regulation prescribe; and after the arrival of any such vessel it shall be the duty of such owner, agent, consignee, or master to report to such immigration officer in writing as soon as discovered all cases in which any such alien has illegally landed from the vessel, giving a description of such alien, together with any information likely to lead to his apprehension; and before the departure of any such vessel it shall be the duty of such owner, agent, consignee, or master to deliver to such immigration officer a further list containing the names of all alien employees who were not employed thereon at the time of the arrival but who will leave port thereon at the time of her departure, and also the names of those, if any, who have been paid off and discharged, and of those, if any, who have deserted or landed; and in case of the failure of such owner, agent, consignee, or master so to deliver either of the said lists of such aliens arriving and departing, respectively, or so to report such cases of desertion or landing, such owner, agent, consignee, or master shall, if required by the Secretary of Labor, pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $10 for each alien concerning whom correct lists are not delivered or a true report is not made as above required; and no such vessel shall be granted clearance pending the determination of the question of the liability to the payment of such fine, and, in the event such fine is imposed, while it remains unpaid; nor shall such fine be remitted or refunded: Provided, That clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such question upon deposit of a sum sufficient to cover such fine.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama to answer this question: Suppose a man who is excluded—and we will take an Italian—under the preceding sections of this law because he is illiterate. Suppose he ships in a vessel sailing from Naples and comes to this country. Now, the gentleman will recall the case of a man who shipped on a ship and signed to be paid 50 cents for the round trip—obviously shipped for the purpose of getting into the United States.

Now, under the law as it was at that time his consul could pick him up for desertion, but under the La Follette Act, combined with this act, if that particular man leaves that particular ship when it arrives in the harbor of New York, he simply breaks a contract, and the consul has no right to pick him up. It may be true, if the immigration officials find him in the United States, they can deport him as a person unlawfully in the country, but he is not subject to examination; he has the right to get off the ship, and if he simply makes up his mind he will not go back to the ship he is here. I would like to ask the gentleman what part of my statement is incorrect?

Mr. BURNETT. I should say that in the main the gentleman is correct.

Mr. BENNET. So I say that if you do not strengthen this provision in another place every illiterate Italian who wants to come in can come.

Mr. BURNETT. There is general authority given to the Commissioner General of Immigration to make regulations for these matters, and under that authority it is likely he will prevent all that.

Mr. BENNET. He has authority to make regulations not inconsistent with law?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. BENNET. But he can not make regulations inconsistent either with this act or with the La Follette Act.

Mr. AUSTIN. I thought the gentleman from New York was in favor of the illiterates coming in; so this ought to appeal to him.

Mr. BENNET. I am in favor of them coming in legally, but I am not in favor of subterfuges.

Mr. SABATH. You would not charge the gentleman from Alabama with deliberately trying to make it possible for all these illiterate people, whom you claim could come in under the provisions of this law, to gain admittance to the United States? If the gentleman from New York attempts to cast any such insinuations against the gentleman from Alabama, I shall certainly protest. [Laughter.]

Mr. BENNET. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois as to the sincerity of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT]. He wants to keep the illiterate people out. I simply call attention to the fact that he is not doing it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think the question is one that ought to be very carefully considered by the gentleman from Alabama after this bill passes. Nearly all these provisions that are in the bill now were in the bill that passed before the seamen's act became a law. There are a few slight changes.

I notice in this bill that you insert, in line 7, page 60, now "illegally landed from the vessel," although you carry the word "deserted," in line 17, and the word "desertion," in line 21. I do not know whether there is such a thing as desertion any more from a merchant vessel. Of course, there is from a naval vessel. The trouble will be that these men under the seamen's act have the right to demand their pay and to leave the service of the vessel, and then they are authorized to land, and there is no supervision over them except that a report must be made by the master when the vessel sails. Those men have landed and have not returned to the vessel. Well, vessels frequently are in port for several days or a week, and sometimes longer, and, of course, if the purpose should have been to evade the immigration law, it will be of very little value to know a week or two after a man landed that he did land. They will not find him, and his name will not be the same, and probably the color of his hair will not be the same. He will have changed.

Now, I do not undertake to say just what ought to be done, but I call it to the attention of the gentleman now, because when the seaman's act was up the matter gave me a good deal of difficulty as to what would happen with the immigration act if the literacy test did become the law.

Mr. SABATH. I wish to state to the gentleman from Illinois that that matter has been thoroughly considered by the committee, and the statement has been made that "once a seaman always a seaman," and that these men always live in certain sections of the city right close to the wharves or close to the landings.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but if my colleague will recall he will know that where you open a conduit and water is there it will run down the hill. You open a method by which men can bring a class of citizens into the United States, and they will find a way if it is left open. Of course it will not be the real sailors who will do this, but it will be men who have been employed as sailors, with the provision that they will break their contract when they get here and do the identical thing that they can do, and do it legally.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

I want to say to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] that in my experience in the Consular Service I visited the wharves every time a passenger vessel sailed for an American port, and they had to put on extra men every time they made up their crew. When they landed in America many of the crew deserted the ship, and they had difficulty in finding or providing a full crew on this side. So that unless this matter is carefully guarded many of those coming in in this way, filling the vacancies on the crews abroad, desert and thus avoid a compliance with the immigration laws.

Mr. BURNETT. That is the very purpose of this amendment. I will say that they bring them over here on the big ships, with a nominal passage of 50 cents, and as soon as they get here they desert and come in, and there is no way to prevent it. It is our intention to guard that as carefully as we can, and the law officer of the department tells me they have gone over it time and again with the officer that has charge of the seamen's law, and it is their opinion there will be no trouble.

Mr. SABATH. In addition to that, the section provides—

That after the arrival of any such vessel it shall be the duty of such owner, agent, consignee, or master to report to such immigration officer, in writing, as soon as discovered—

Not 7 days later or 10 days later—

as soon as discovered, all cases in which any such alien has illegally landed from the vessel, giving a description of such alien, together with any formation likely to lead to his apprehension.

I think we have covered it carefully.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 37. That the word "person" as used in this act shall be construed to import both plural and the singular, as the case may be, and shall include corporations, companies, and associations. When construing and enforcing the provisions of this act, the act, omission, or failure of any director, officer, agent, or employee of any corporation, company, or association acting within the scope of his employment or office shall in every case be deemed to be the act, omission, or failure of such corporation, company, or association, as well as that of the person acting for or in behalf of such corporation, company, or association.

Mr. BENNET and Mr. FOSS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] is recognized.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment in the way of a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, after line 18, page 61, as a new section, the following:

"When the President, in his discretion, shall deem it for the public interest so to do, he may, notwithstanding the provisions of this act, admit any alien by Executive order for such time or on such terms as he may deem advisable."

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, if I can have the attention of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT], I want to say that the intent of this act, especially the contract-labor provisions, is to tie up pretty strictly the admission of aliens. Now, conditions may arise in connection with the extension of our Army and Navy when some department of our Government should want for one purpose or another to bring an alien into this country, we will say, under contract. Under the existing law the right to do that would be very doubtful. This amendment simply reposes in the President of the United States the power, in a case in which he thought it was necessary for the best interests of the United States, by Executive order to let in a particular person. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote. I could not agree to that.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, the time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] has not yet expired, and he has yielded to me for a question. My question is this: If your amendment should pass, then by Executive order the President could do away with any part of the immigration law, if he might so desire, and let any immigrant he wants to come into the country?

Mr. BENNET. Oh, a President could do that; but I do not think we have ever elected a President of the United States that would, and I do not think he will. I think he ought to have the power in exceptional cases.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss] moves to strike out the last word, and asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill. I have always supported in this House a bill restricting immigration.

The Republican Party in its platform in 1896 declared in favor of the restriction of immigration and the imposition of an educational test to the effect that an alien should be able to read and write before being admitted to this country. The Republican platform in that day went a great deal farther than this bill does. This bill provides only that an alien shall be able to read 30 to 40 words in the English language or some other language; but the platform 20 years ago stated that he should not only read, but read and write, which is twice as burdensome a restriction as imposed in this bill; and that was declared at a time when the immigration into this country was only one-third as great as it has been during the last decade prior to the present war.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to his colleague?

Mr. FOSS. No; I can not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. FOSS. We impose restrictions on immigration against the physically, mentally, and morally unsound, and why should we not place a restriction in the matter of illiteracy, knowing that its effect will be to keep out a great number of undesirable citizens who come here. It is not much of a test purely from the education standpoint, but it is a test of aspiration, as has been well said, and I trust that it will be to the immigrant a test of inspiration. [Applause.] In the past the only test has been the test of respiration. [Laughter.] American citizenship, in my judgment, is a thing to be striven for, and the more we impress that idea upon the immigrant who is about to come to this country, the higher he will value American citizenship when he gets here.

I realize that we are an immigrant Nation. Our forefathers came here from other countries. Some of them caught the first boat, and the rest came later. There have been two great tides of immigration. The old immigrantion began in the early period of the history of our country and ended about 1882, from the countries of high and central Europe. That was a magnificent immigration, because the people that came went out over the land and settled it and built homes and villages and towns and cities.

But the new immigration, coming from about the year 1882 down to the present time, has been composed largely of immigrants from the countries of low Europe. They have not settled the land. In fact, statistics go to show that less than 1 per cent of these people are to-day operating farms either as owners or tenants. A large percentage of them never bring their families with them, and most of their money they send home. Some of them who come over here care no more about this country than what they can make out of it. They have gone into our great cities and have increased and multiplied the problems of civic, industrial, and social life, and they have added tremendously to the burdens of government and have not thought enough of it to become citizens.

It is to my mind a dangerous situation that there are to-day nearly two million and a half male aliens over 21 years of age who have not taken any steps to become citizens. We have gladly in the past welcomed to this country citizens from every clime, but for my part, I am not willing much longer to throw open the doors to those who come here, and profit by their residence here, and who do not care to become identified with our country and to support and uphold its institutions.

We have treated the foreign born better than the native born. Some of the States in the Union have laws permitting aliens to vote upon filing first papers after six months' or one year's residence. But when it comes to the American boy, who is born here, we require that he shall pass through the different grades of our common school and then wait until he is 21 before he can vote. Is this justice to the American youth?

I think this educational test is the very least requirement that we could impose. It is so simple that anybody can conform to it, and then it is in keeping with the spirit of republican institutions. America ought to lead the world in literacy, but she does not; Germany does. The number of illiterates in Germany is less than in any other country.

Whenever I visit Plymouth, where our forefathers landed, I invariably climb the hill back of the town and look upon that splendid monument erected to the memory of the Pilgrim Fathers—a majestic figure of a woman representing Faith, resting upon four great foundation stones marked "Liberty, law, morality, and education." The impression that our country should make upon the immigrant when he lands first upon our shores is that we stand here for liberty and law and liberty under the law, and also for education and character. [Applause.]

There are some people who are afraid that a little Americanism will get into this bill. I want to say to you that what the country needs to-day is a revival of patriotic Americanism all over. [Applause.] It is high time that Americans looked after America. [Applause.]

I regard this bill a step toward national preparedness. With a protective tariff, a strong Army, and a large Navy we will be in a position to meet the issues of the future. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOSS. I believe in a broad and educated Americanism, an Americanism whose first primer is the Pilgrims' covenant, drawn up in the cabin of the Mayflower, which declared that the freely expressed will of the majority should be the law of all, whose first reader is the Declaration of Independence, whose dictionary is the Constitution of the United States, and whose greatest commentary is the emancipation proclamation; an Americanism which will place the foreign-born sons side by side with the descendants of the Puritan and the Cavalier, but no higher, and whose loftiest sentiment is the exclamation of Patrick Henry, "I am not a Virginian, but am an American!" [Applause.]

So likewise, in these uncertain times let every citizen, regardless of his birthplace, rise to that supreme height of American patriotism where he can say, "I am not an Englishman, a German, a Frenchman, an Austrian, a Pole, or a Bohemian, but an American." [Applause.]

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section close in two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves that all debate on this section close in two minutes.

Mr. SABATH. Make it seven minutes.

Mr. BURNETT. Very well. I make it seven minutes, Mr. Chairman, the time to be used by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves that all debate on this section close in seven minutes, the time to be used by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH]. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, not knowing whether I will ever again have the opportunity on the floor of this House to defend the alien who comes to our shores in search of the political and religious freedom which he is denied in his native country and who comes here with respect and enthusiasm in his heart for the institutions and the fundamental principles upon which our great Nation is founded, I will attempt to briefly set before the House a few of the reasons which have prompted me during the past 10 years to lend a helping hand to the people who have, by coming to America in constantly increasing numbers, made possible the tremendous growth and development of these United States.

I realize that this bill is about to pass the House of Representatives, and I realize that in my bitter opposition to the literacy test which it contains I may have spoken harsh words and may have spoken hastily to some of the gentlemen who have urged the passage of this bill.

I wish to say that I sincerely hope that none of the gentlemen have taken offense at my remarks, and I trust that they will appreciate the fact that in the heat of debate we sometimes say things we do not mean.

The Members of this House who have voted in favor of the various amendments and in favor of the literacy test have done so believing that they were serving the best interests of the people whom they have been sent here to represent. I have opposed this bill in the same spirit, but I have opposed it with a knowledge of the conditions under which the people who come here have lived in their native countries. I have also opposed the bill with a knowledge of the conditions under which they labor in the United States and the progress which they and their children after them have made.

I believe that if some of the gentlemen who have urged the passage of this immigration bill had had the same opportunity of acquainting themselves with these people as I have had they would have voted to strike out any suggestion of a literacy test.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss] after remaining silent the six days of debate on this bill has just read into the RECORD a prepared speech in which he states that while the immigrants that came to this country prior to 1882 were desirable immigrants, those who have come to us subsequent to 1882 or during the last twenty-five-odd years are of a class of people who can not be assimilated by this melting pot of all nations.

Does he refer to the sturdy, law-abiding German people? Does he refer to the Bohemian, the Polish, and the Jewish people who come to the United States with the idea of settling in a country where they will be free from the oppression of aristocracy and monarchy.

If the gentleman refers to these people, his statements are not only false and unjustified, but, being directed against the great majority of the people of the city which he in part represents, they are little short of traitorous.

Mr. Chairman, 76 per cent of the population of the city of Chicago—which the gentleman, as well as I, have the honor to represent—is composed of foreign-born people and citizens of foreign parentage. I defy the gentleman to say that the people of this great city are not patriotic, law-abiding citizens of these United States. [Applause.]

I have in my hand a report from the War Department, published only a few days ago, showing the number of young men who enlisted when the recent call was made for men to protect the honor of our flag and of our country. I am proud to say that in the city of Chicago a greater number of boys enlisted than in any other city of the United States.

About 12 per cent of all the enlistments came from a city 76 per cent of the population of which is composed of citizens of foreign birth or parentage.

Mr. Chairman, this is not the first time that the loyalty and patriotism of American citizens of foreign birth has been questioned. I have often heard this charge made on the floor of the House, and I have consistently answered the statements by saying that these people are as loyal to our flag and to the country of their adoption as those who are descended from the Pilgrims who came to this country in the Mayflower.

They demonstrated this in the Revolutionary War, in the Civil War, and in the Spanish-American War, and if the time ever comes when the citizens of the United States are called upon to give their lives to protect our country, the foreign-born Americans will again demonstrate to you that they are more than willing to give their quota of young men for the purpose of defending the institutions of the country for which they abandoned home, friends, and traditions. [Applause.]

Mr. BURNETT, the chairman of the Committee on Immigration of the House, and the father of this bill, has passionately appealed to you for the passage of the bill. He has again given you the same reasons as heretofore, namely, that he desires to protect the American laboring man and protect him from the terrible immigrant whom he charges with beating down the price of labor and lowering the standard of living in the United States.

To him and to all other gentlemen who make such arguments, such as my friend Mr. AUSTIN, the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. QUIN, the gentleman from Mississippi, and others, I wish to say that they can not substantiate their statements nor can they prove that the immigrant has or is responsible for beating down the price of labor or lowering the standard of living here.

On the contrary, within the last 20 years, and especially within the last 10 years, the wage of the American laboring man has increased, the working hours have been reduced, and the standard of living has been improved. Especially is this true in all Northern and Eastern States, where we have the largest percentage of immigration.

I regret that this does not apply to such an extent in the Southern States, especially in the sections of the country which are represented by the gentlemen whom I have named.

The statistics show that within the past 12 years the hours of labor have decreased over 6 per cent and the wages have increased over 37 per cent.

This increase in wages applies to the North and East, but does not apply to the South, notwithstanding the fact that these Southern States are not hampered with immigration.

I have repeatedly stated on the floor of this House that if I thought that immigration was detrimental to the American laboring man I would not hesitate to vote for restrictive immigrant legislation.

But I have always maintained, and I maintain now, that immigration has been beneficial to the American laboring man and to our country.

It has elevated the American laboring man; it has improved conditions; it has created a demand for a higher grade and higher priced labor.

The great majority of these despised immigrants do the hardest kind of work. Those who do not work on the farms tilling the soil and producing our bumper crops are in our quarries and mines producing raw material. They are found in the forests cutting timber. They are found digging our ditches and building our roads.

One immigrant digs a ton of coal from a mine and another immigrant digs a ton of ore from a distant place. The ton of coal and the ton of ore are transported by still other laborers to the same factory. The coal is used in reducing the ore to iron and the iron is in turn worked by still other laborers into steel. In this way the initial labor of the immigrant creates a demand for skilled labor to complete the work which he has begun.

As to the lowering of the standard of living, every investigation that has been made in the last 20 years has shown that the living conditions of the laboring man have wonderfully improved.

Mr. Chairman, due to the large immigration during the past 20 years our country has prospered as no other country ever did. We are to-day recognized as the leading Nation of the world. In literature, art, and industry, as well as commerce, we are the richest and most prosperous Nation in the world, and in the largest measure this is due to the immigrants who helped to develop our resources and helped to build up our commerce, making it possible for us to-day to compete with and undersell the world.

Our exports in 1912 exceeded our imports by $551,000,000. In 1913 our exports exceeded our imports by $652,876,916, and in 1915 the excess of exports over imports was $1,094,000,000.

Exports and imports by land and sea.

Exports for 1914	$2,364,579,148
Imports for 1914	1,893,925,657
Excess of exports over imports for 1914	470,653,491
Exports for 1915	2,768,589,340
Imports for 1915	1,674,169,740
Excess of exports over imports for 1915	1,094,419,600

Would this be possible if we did not have labor with which to produce and manufacture all the thousands of different articles which make up this great total? Not in the world.

It is charged that the immigrant does not go to the farm, and again the proponents of this measure are in error. It is the main hope of every immigrant to secure for himself as soon as possible a piece of land which he can call his own.

Mr. Chairman, in the year 1910 there were 478,451,750 acres of farm land improved and 400,346,575 acres of farm land unimproved in the United States. This shows that over 45 per cent of our total farm land, not including land unadapted for farm purposes, was still unimproved, and this surely indicates that there is plenty of farm land upon which our incoming immigrants may settle.

In the east North Central States 75.4 per cent of the farm land was improved, and in the west North Central States 70.6 per cent of the farm land was improved. This, Mr. Chairman, is the part of the country to which the great majority of the immigration goes. Contrast with this the South Atlantic section of the country, 46.7 per cent of the farm land of which is improved, and contrast it with the east South Atlantic section of the country, 53.9 per cent of the farm land of which is improved. To these latter sections of the country a very small percentage of our immigration goes.

The immigrants do go to our farms, in spite of the statements of the gentleman from Alabama and others to the contrary. The Department of Labor is now operating a special bureau to assist the alien arriving at our port of entry to get in touch with farmers who need the kind of labor which the immigrant is capable of furnishing. During the months of February, March, April, May, and June, 1915, the Bureau of Information of the Department of Labor, to which I have referred, received 76,421 applications for information relative to positions which were open to those who desired to earn an honest living.

This new bureau of the Department of Labor is rapidly widening its scope and within a short time will be able to reach out and take up the immigrant at Ellis Island, at Philadelphia, at Chicago, and at San Francisco and place him immediately in touch with waiting employment in the interior of the country. Not only will the activities of this bureau affect the incoming immigrant but it will relieve the congestion in our large cities which has been so bitterly complained of by certain Members during the debate upon this bill.

Mr. Chairman, much has been said in regard to child labor in the United States. In this connection I wish to say that out of 48 States in the United States 46 have legislated upon the subject of the hours of labor of minors and have by law restricted the hours of their employment. There are only two States—New Mexico and West Virginia—whose statute books are silent upon this subject.

In the State of Alabama, from which the chairman comes, children under 16 years of age, both boys and girls, employed in any gainful occupation are allowed to work 11 hours per day, 60 hours in a week, and 6 days out of each week. Agricultural and domestic servants may work all hours of the night and day.

In manufacturing establishments children from 16 to 18 years of age are at liberty to work from daylight until dusk, the only prohibition being that if the work is at night the service must be limited to eight hours.

As to mercantile establishments, the laws of the State of Alabama are entirely silent.

On the other hand, in the State of Illinois, which I have the honor in part to represent, children under 16 years of age are limited to eight hours per day six days each week. This work must be performed between the hours of 7 a. m. and 6 p. m. in the case of children under 14 and between the hours of 7 a. m. and 7 p. m. in the case of children between the ages of 14 and 16.

Mr. Chairman, a harsh and unjust literacy test has been inserted in this bill for the purpose of keeping out of this country those people who, through no fault of their own, have been deprived of the opportunity of acquiring an education in their native countries.

It may be true that a great number of the immigrants who present themselves for admission each year are illiterate, but this affects the arriving generation only. Under the laws obtaining in the majority of the States children under a certain age are compelled to attend school. These children are eager to learn. They attend our schools, and statistics will show that a great many of them attain a higher average in their studies than do the native-born children. For the information of the gentlemen of the House, I will read a statement which I hold showing the amount of money spent by eight of our Southern States for education in the year 1913 as contrasted with three of our Northern States, to which the great majority of our immigration goes:

Money spent for education in 1913.

SOUTHERN STATES.

Alabama	$4,078,676
Georgia	5,403,927
North Carolina	4,067,793
South Carolina	2,576,501
Virginia	5,577,874
Arkansas	4,279,478
Kentucky	6,746,302
Louisiana	4,838,491
	38,569,042

NORTHERN STATES.

Illinois	38,052,971
New York	62,041,016
Pennsylvania	46,577,982
	146,671,969

From this you will see that while eight of our Southern States only expended $38,569,042 for the education of their young people in the year 1913, three of our Northern States spent $146,671,969. In my own State alone, the State of Illinois, as much money was spent for education in that year as was expended by the entire eight Southern States.

Mr. Chairman, it has been said that at the close of the present European conflict there will be a great influx of immigrants into the United States. On the contrary, thousands upon thousands of American citizens and aliens, as soon as the war is over, will depart for the fatherland and for the Old World to take the places of their older brothers and fathers who have been killed in this terrible war.

Some try to make us believe that immigration, after the war is over, will increase, but these statements can not be substantiated.

Europe will need every healthy citizen to help to rebuild its industries, and those who are not of sound mind and body can not enter the United States under the present immigration law.

As it is, children under 16 can not enter, unaccompanied by their parents, nor can anyone enter who is physically defective or liable to become a public charge.

Those who could come here under the present law the foreign Governments will not permit to come, as they will be needed at home.

Mr. Chairman, I will not detain the House any longer, but I do want to say that it is not easy to break home ties; it is not easy to leave one's native land, no matter what the conditions are under which the people of a particular country may be living. It is not easy to abandon home and friends and depart for a strange land.

For this reason it is only the individual who is brave enough and determined enough to better his condition in life who has the moral courage to take such a step. It is this character of man that first settled upon our shores, and it is this character of man, coming to our shores in constantly increasing numbers, who has made possible the tremendous growth of our country.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 38. That this act, except as otherwise provided in section 3, shall take effect and be enforced on and after July 1, 1916. The act of March 26, 1910, amending the act of February 20, 1907, to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States; the act of February 20, 1907, to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States, except section 34 thereof; the act of March 3, 1903, to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States, except section 34 thereof; and all other acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed on and after the taking effect of this act: Provided, That this act shall not be construed to repeal, alter, or amend existing laws relating to the immigration or exclusion of Chinese persons or persons of Chinese descent, except as provided in section 19 hereof, nor to repeal, alter, or amend section 6, chapter 453, third session, Fifty-eighth Congress, approved February 6, 1905, or the act approved August 2, 1882, entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers by sea," and amendments thereto: Provided further, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to affect any prosecution, suit, action, or proceedings brought, or any act, thing, or matter, civil or criminal, done or existing at the time of the taking effect of this act, except as mentioned in the third proviso of section 19 hereof; but as to all such prosecutions, suits, actions, proceedings, acts, things, or matters, the laws or parts of laws repealed or amended by this act are hereby continued in force and effect.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I am about to move that the committee rise and report the bill, and I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three or four minutes, not in discussion of the bill but on another matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to proceed for four minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I want to emphasize what my distinguished colleague on the committee [Mr. SABATH] has said and express the views that I have of the patriotism of every member of that committee, as well as every Member of this House. I have risen especially to say a few words in regard to the committee. Of that committee of 15 there were 7 new members. I have never seen any committee, either old or new, that worked more earnestly, more conscientiously, and more intelligently than that committee; and as an older member of the committee, having served on it for many, many years, I desire to state that some of the suggestions made by the new members of the committee were wise suggestions and have been incorporated in this bill. I believe that every man did his conscientious duty, and I never worked with a committee that was more harmonious, because every member of that committee was a born gentleman and not an outlaw. [Applause.] All the way through the long proceedings and deliberations I do not remember a single time when partisanship ever entered into the deliberations of the committee, unless it was for a moment or two in a facetious way. I believe every man on that committee worked and acted and voted as he thought, not for party advantage but as he believed for the good of this great country; because this is a nonpartisan question, and I am glad to say that gentlemen who have heretofore honestly and conscientiously opposed the bill time and time again have now realized that changed conditions have arisen under which something must be done. I have never taken any stock in the denunciation of hyphenated Americans, because I believe the record of the prosecutions in the courts during the last few months of those who were trying to destroy property showed that they were men without the hyphen, men who had never become American citizens. I am not afraid of those who have come here for the purpose of becoming American citizens, whether they come from Germany, from the Jewish countries, from Scotland, Ireland, or any other country. It is the men without the hyphen, who can not obtain the hyphen, who I believe are dangerous and whom I want to keep out.

Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10384) to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States, and had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I believe that under the rule the previous question is considered as ordered upon a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. That is true. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to move to recommit the bill with instructions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves to recommit the bill with instructions, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SABATH moves to recommit the bill H. R. 10384 to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, with instructions to strike out the following and report forthwith:

"That after three months from the passage of this act, in addition to the aliens who are by law now excluded from admission into the United States, the following persons shall also be excluded from admission thereto, to wit:

"All aliens over 16 years of age, physically capable of reading, who can not read the English language, or some other language or dialect, including Hebrew or Yiddish: Provided, That any admissible alien, or any alien heretofore or hereafter legally admitted, or any citizen of the United States, may bring in or send for his father or grandfather over 55 years of age, his wife, his mother, his grandmother, or his unmarried or widowed daughter, if otherwise admissible, whether such relative can read or not; and such relative shall be permitted to enter. That for the purpose of ascertaining whether aliens can read the immigrant inspectors shall be furnished with slips of uniform size, prepared under the direction of the Secretary of Labor, each containing not less than 30 nor more than 40 words in ordinary use, printed in plainly legible type in some one of the various languages or dialects of immigrants. Each alien may designate the particular language or dialect in which he desires the examination to be made, and shall be required to read the words printed on the slip in such language or dialect. That the following classes of persons shall be exempt from the operation of the illiteracy test, to wit: All aliens who shall prove to the satisfaction of the proper immigration officer or to the Secretary of Labor that they are seeking admission to the United States to avoid religious persecution in the country of their last permanent residence, whether such persecution be evidenced by overt acts or by laws or governmental regulations that discriminate against the alien or the race to which he belongs because of his religious faith; all aliens who have been lawfully admitted to the United States and who have resided therein continuously for five years, and who have in accordance with the law declared their intention of becoming citizens of the United States and who return to the United States within six months from the date of their departure therefrom; all aliens in transit through the United States; all aliens who have been lawfully admitted to the United States and who later shall go in transit from one part of the United States to another through foreign contiguous territory."

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 107, nays 284, answered "present" 3, not voting 39, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire how I am recorded?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recorded in the negative.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Speaker, I voted inadvertently. I am paired with the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. MEEKER, and I desire to withdraw my vote of "nay" and answer "present."

The name of Mr. BOOHER was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. MORRISON. I voted "yea." I understand that if he were present he would vote "yea" also, so I desire to have my vote stand.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

On the vote:

Mr. GRIEST (for immigration bill) with Mr. EDMONDS (against immigration bill).

Mr. HENRY (for immigration bill) with Mr. STINESS (against immigration bill).

Mr. GUERNSEY (for immigration bill) with Mr. MCGILLICUDDY (against immigration bill).

Mr. HART (for immigration bill) with Mr. GRAHAM (against immigration bill).

Mr. ROWLAND (for immigration bill) with Mr. SCULLY (against immigration bill).

Mr. HILLIARD (for immigration bill) with Mr. LOUD (against immigration bill).

Mr. LEWIS (for immigration bill) with Mr. DOREMUS (against immigration bill).

Mr. WINGO (for immigration bill) with Mr. CARY (against immigration bill).

Mr. DYER (for immigration bill) with Mr. IGOE (against immigration bill).

Mr. MEEKER (for immigration bill) with Mr. BOOHER (against immigration bill).

Mr. EDWARDS (for immigration bill) with Mr. TILSON (against immigration bill).

Mr. YOUNG of Texas (for immigration bill) with Mr. HAMILL (against immigration bill).

Mr. DENT (for immigration bill) with Mr. FAIRCHILD (against immigration bill).

Until further notice:

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS with Mr. PLATT.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. BURNETT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. DOREMUS, for 10 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. RODENBERG, on account of sickness.

PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes in defense of some of my constituents.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes in defense of some of his constituents. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I do not know whether I will object or not—I desire to have that request coupled with one I shall make, and that is that I be given such time as the gentleman from Texas in case I see fit to ask for it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I have no way of controlling this House.

Mr. GALLIVAN. I have of the gentleman's request; I can stop the gentleman's request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to be permitted to address the House for five minutes on a matter of a personal nature, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] couples with it the request that he be allowed to have such time as the gentleman from Texas uses if he wants to do so. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, during my absence from the House day before yesterday while presiding over a meeting of the Committee on Indian Affairs, then in session, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] made an unjust and unwarranted attack on some of the good citizens of Cooke County, Tex. The attack is based on the fact that some men were hanged at Gainesville in the early part of the Civil War. I do not know enough about the history of the matter to now attempt a complete reply to this attack, but at a later day I shall be able to produce facts to successfully refute his unwarranted statements. No county or State in this Union has a better citizenship than Cooke County now has or has always had.

The men hanged, so I have always understood, were hanged after being tried and found guilty by a military tribunal composed of Confederate and State officers. The persons hanged were charged with treason against the State and the Confederacy by arming themselves and forming a military oath-bound secret organization, for the purpose of joining a regiment of Kansas "Jay Hawkers," who were believed then to be preparing to invade Texas from the north, Cooke County having been selected as the point of attack.

Mr. Speaker, I have just been handed a telegram from Mr. J. Z. Keel, the mayor of Gainesville, the county seat of Cooke County, the town so maliciously attacked by the gentleman from Massachusetts. The character of Mr. Keel is unimpeachable, and no man in Texas stands higher in the public estimation.

I am willing to stake my own reputation for truth that every word of this telegram is true; and its truth will be proved to the full satisfaction of this House before this matter is ended. The telegram is as follows:

GAINESVILLE, TEX., March 29, 1916.

Hon. JOHN H. STEPHENS,
Washington, D. C.:

The accusation made by GALLIVAN that 42 men were hung here because they refused to join the Confederate Army is a falsehood of such enormous proportions that the honorable gentleman should make an apology before your august body.

J. Z. KEEL, Mayor.

[Applause.]

The language I used in my speech which the gentleman took as his text for maligning myself and my constituents is as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Bible tells us that a man can not serve two masters, and human experience abundantly sustains this doctrine, therefore there can be no English, German, Irish, or Catholic American, because a man can not serve two masters; if they are Americans, they can not be a German, Britisher, or Irishman. I regret to state that many men who have taken the oath of allegiance to the United States, thereby renouncing their allegiance to any foreign prince, potentate, or power, have since the beginning of the present great European war forgotten their oaths and are now boldly taking the side of their relatives by blood, and have also boldly criticized our Congress and our President, thereby rocking our ship of state, making it much harder for our good and great President to steer clear of all foreign complications that might lead our country into war, which God forbid.

That is the language that is objected to by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Construing that sentence as I intended it would read this way: "There can not be a German, there can not be a Britisher, or there can not be an Irishman if they are Americans."

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will yield when I get through with my statement, if I have any time remaining. It was furthest from my thought when I wrote this language in the speech to raise any question relative to any religion or want of religion, and the argument here was that we should have no hyphenated American in this country so strongly set forth as it is in the President's last message to this House. That seems to be the gist of my crime, and the reason why the gentleman has become so aroused and attacks the people of my district as he has done.

After quoting this, my language, in his speech, he launches out into a diatribe of abuse against myself and the citizens of Texas and Cooke County. What connection he found between the above language used by me in advocating the Burnett immigration bill and the alleged crime of the citizens of Texas, said to have been committed during the Civil War, is entirely beyond my comprehension.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be granted five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas have five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The malicious charges made by him are found in a five-column speech alleged to have been made by him in five minutes. The fact is that only one-half of the first column was made on the floor of the House of Representatives; he was yielded only five minutes to talk, and he has put a 30-minute speech in the RECORD, and it is found in the current debates of that day and where all of the language used is required to have been actually spoken on the floor. He knew that I was not present and took advantage of my absence to abuse my constituents. As to myself, I bid him—

Lay on, Macduff;
And damn'd be he that first cries, "Hold, enough!"

[Applause.]

The above language used by me that he pretends to answer was not and does not purport to have been made on the floor, but is printed in an appendix to the RECORD, where speeches by permission of the House are permitted to be printed as extension of remarks. This has been the practice of the House for many years.

The gentleman from Massachusetts seems to have just found out that Texas was a rebellious State and that it was his privilege to abuse her for joining the Southern Confederacy. Does he not know that when the South laid down her arms she did so in good faith, and that each State of the former Confederacy sent her quota of volunteers to the Spanish-American War as readily as any of the Northern States? The Republican Party ruled this Nation for many years by waving the bloody shirt, and it has remained for the gentleman from Massachusetts, who claims to be a Democrat, to continue to disgrace his party by digging up and raising aloft the old discredited bloody shirt and make it do service in the unholy crusade designed to leave the doors open for introducing into this country thousands of undesirable immigrants.

I shall always fight and vote for stringent immigration laws, notwithstanding the howlers may howl, the growlers may growl, and the ghouls who delight in digging into the graves of the past may thereby continue to dig their own political graves as deep as their ghoulish instincts may dictate. It is only a few politicians who indulge in this nefarious practice.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the House for the extension of time. [Applause.]

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for nine minutes.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I accept the gentleman's apology. [Laughter.] The next time that he gets unanimous consent to print a speech in the RECORD I suggest to the gentleman from Texas that he print with it a constructive map, so that no one may again misconstrue just what he intended to say. He did not intend to criticize the Catholic. Again, I accept his apology, and the apology that I send back to the mayor of Gainesville is this: I am going to offer in this House a resolution appropriating $100,000 for a monument to be erected in Gainesville to the memory of those martyred heroes of the Civil War. [Applause.] That is my apology! How do you like it?

Now, the gentleman from Texas says that he was absent from the floor of this House when I spoke on Tuesday, and that I took advantage of his absence. As a matter of fact, I never knew him to see him until yesterday. [Laughter.] Almost from the first day that he entered this House I have known something of his narrowness and bigotry, and when he speaks of "ghoulish glee" let me say to the gentleman from Texas that I am a better Democrat than he is, and that every time I open my mouth in this House I am serving my party better than he has served it in his entire career. I never hear the religious question raised in this House except on this side of the aisle, and the gentleman ought to be ashamed of himself to raise it in this enlightened era. He is making it almost an impossibility for you, Mr. Speaker, to preside over the next Congress of the United States. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The gentleman—once again may I make it clear to the House—the gentleman rose here one day last week and, asking unanimous consent to extend his remarks, without uttering one word of any speech—because he has not the courage to make that kind of a speech on this floor—printed a speech in the back of the RECORD in which he made the attack to which I took exceptions.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Alabama rise?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am afraid that these gentlemen are getting a little personal in their remarks. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Of course the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] will observe the rules.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Of course, Mr. Speaker, as closely as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] observes them.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I was about to say when interrupted by the great champion of the South, my good friend from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], that of this speech not one word was delivered in this Hall. What I had to say about the gentleman from Texas—every word of it—was spoken from the very spot where I now stand. The only extension in my remarks was the historical narrative relating to these awful murders at Gainesville; and if they are not authentic, then you from Gainesville should rise here and offer a resolution to expurgate the Congressional Library, a library which has cost the Government millions of dollars already, and is costing us millions more to maintain—expunge from it the books from which I quoted what I had to say, not about the people of your city to-day, excepting as represented here, but about the people of Gainesville in 1862. You said, sir, that no Irishman, no German, no Englishman, no Catholic could be a good American——

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman has no right to address another Member of the House in the second person.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is absolutely correct.

Mr. GALLIVAN. I was addressing the Member from Texas through the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts must not address a Member of the House by the second personal pronoun.

Mr. GALLIVAN. The gentleman was worried about how I could make a connection between his remarks and what happened at Gainesville. He said in the RECORD that these men he assailed could not be patriotic Americans, and I just wanted to have the House and the country know the kind of patriotism the gentleman from Texas imbibed in his youth, and that is the kind of patriotism I am proud to say no Irish-American, no German-American, no English-American, and no Catholic-American can ever be persuaded to adopt in this day and this hour. That is the connection I made between his remarks and the kind of patriotism that he and the people of his city in 1862 preached.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have no personal quarrel with the gentleman. [Laughter.] As I said before, until yesterday I did not even know him. I know something now of his career in Congress when these questions come up, and I am almost ashamed, knowing what I know about him, to sit on the same side of the aisle with him. He does not do his party the service that he stands here pretending to do.

He is doing you men from the South incalculable harm in the North and in the West, and when I challenge his statements I do it as much for my party as I do it for my people. Oh, I will come back here just as long as I choose to come. I shall be in Congress when you shall be out of it. I never fear for my future in these halls so long as I have the power of speech to answer attacks like those of the gentleman from Texas. [Applause.]

AMERICAN ACADEMY OF ARTS AND LETTERS.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that Senate bill 1424, incorporating the American Academy of Arts and Letters, now on the Speaker's table, be laid before the House for present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House Senate bill 1424, an identical House bill being reported with a favorable report on the House Calendar. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1424) incorporating the American Academy of Arts and Letters.

Be it enacted, etc., That William Dean Howells, of Maine; Henry Adams, of the District of Columbia; Theodore Roosevelt, of New York; John Singer Sargent, of Massachusetts; Daniel Chester French, of New York; John Burroughs, of New York; James Ford Rhodes, of Massachusetts; Horatio William Parker, of Connecticut; William Milligan Sloane, of New Jersey; Robert Underwood Johnson, of New York; George Washington Cable, of Massachusetts; Andrew Dickson White, of New York; Henry van Dyke, of New Jersey; William Crary Brownell, of New York; Basil Lanneau Gildersleeve, of Maryland; Woodrow Wilson, of New Jersey; Arthur Twining Hadley, of Connecticut; Henry Cabot Lodge, of Massachusetts; Edwin Howland Blashfield, of New York; William Merritt Chase, of New York; Thomas Hastings, of New York; Hamilton Wright Mabie, of New Jersey; Brander Matthews, of New York; Thomas Nelson Page, of the District of Columbia; Elihu Vedder, of Massachusetts; George Edward Woodberry, of Massachusetts; Kenyon Cox, of New York; George Whitefield Chadwick, of Massachusetts; Abbott Handerson Thayer, of New Hampshire; Henry Mills Alden, of New Jersey——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and fifteen gentlemen are present—not a quorum.

Mr. SLAYDEN. A call of the House, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn until——

The SPEAKER. You can not do anything without a quorum. Does the gentleman from Texas move a call of the House or not?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I did move a call of the House, Mr. Speaker.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. KITCHIN. I move, Mr. Speaker, that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Two gentlemen move that the House adjourn. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 24 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, March 31, 1916, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:
